Katharine's Sacrifice

and came to a standstill just before her.

His heart was bearing madly, wildly. The task he had set himself was greater than he had supposed, but his courage did not fail, nor his purpose falter.

She was there before him in her bauty—the beauty which was not shadowed by the black cloud of shame—her soul was in danger! He must stretch out his hand and save her at once if it was to be done at all.

"Katharine," he said, solemnly, but with his deep love dwelling in every tone, "what have you done? My poor girl!"

A sob rose to her lips, but she choked it back.

Now, the fullness of Gordon's revenge use to confront her in all its hideous

Now, the fullness of Gordon's revenge rose to confront her in all its hideousness. She was dishonored in Ormande's eyes; she stood there seeming to him a shameful thing, who had wantonly and willfully rushed into the path of sin. She, Katharine Brereton, the proud, pure spirit whose record was as white, as blameless, as an angel's! Two or three words would set all this right, only two or three words, and yet she must not, she dare not, utter them.

A shudder ran through her at the fiendish cruelty that had planned this torture. From Barthara Mostyn's insults she had never winced. She knew the girl to be her greatest enemy, and therefore she expected nothing kind and sympathetic, though even Gordon would have been startled could he have heard the avalanche of abuse hurled at his wife's head by his confederate. He had instructed Barbara to dismiss the girl, to hint at a flirtation with her guest, and to boldly tackle her on the question of any understanding between Katharine and himself, but he did not tell Miss Mostyn to indulge her jealous hatred and anger so far as to behave like a thorough viriago and a fish fag. Barbara's insults had fallen off Katharine's around contents.

and anger so far as to behave like a thorough virago and a fish fag. Barbara's insults had fallen off Katharine's proud, contemptuous mind; but Ornande's pity, his gravity, his sorrow was another matter; it shattered the cold, icy indifference that she had wrapped round her heart on the night she found she was to leave Brexley and follow her husband to town, even his accident at Euston imon the night she found she was to leave Brexley and follow her husband to town; even his accident at Euston im-mediately on their arrival and his suf-ferings did not melt it, but Ormande's voice pierced through her heart of hearts and rent the patched-up wound assunder. Katharine felt her limbs tremble under her as she leaned against the wall.

tremble under her as she leaned against the wall.

"Do not, oh, do not pity me!" she cried in husky, choked accents. "It— it is more than I can bear!"

"Can you ask me to stand before you as you are now, and not pity you!" Ormande asked, almost fiercely. "Katharine, it is impossible! When I think of what you were to me only a few days ago—what I deemed you to be—my heart fails me with sorrow and dismay!" He passed his hand over his brow. "Katharine," he went on, after a slight pause, "I speak to you now, not as your friend or your lover, but as your clergyman. You are living a sinful life, you are wronging Heaven and yourself, and I cannot stand by and suffer you to do this without protesting, urging, pleading to you to renounce your sin, to repent and return to the place you once held. I do not ask your reasons for this strange, incomprehensibly strange conduct. Doubtless you are satisfied yourself; but I do entreat you to listen to my warning voice, and to save your soul ere it be too late!"

Katharine neither spoke nor moved.

too late!"
Katharine neither spoke nor moved for a moment. In that time she seemed to mass through the bitterness of death for a moment. In that time she seemed to pass through the bitterness of death itself. Oh, for freedom to cry alound the truth, to say. "Cease, you wrong me: I am his wife!" to justify herself in his eyes, but she pould not do this. Gordon's threat was before her, staring at her which ever way she might turn; and though he was still ill, though he had gone almost to the last gasp during the past week, he was now himself again as far as brain power went, and ing the past week, he was now himself again as far as brain power went, and Katharine, nervous and unstrung, feared to turn at every sound lest some secret emissary had gone forth to harm or maim her dear love. Had any other creature in this matter-of-fact nine-teenth century sworn such a vow of murderous revenge, she would not have regarded it as otherwise than absurd; but Gordon was so different, to her it seemed as though he were in league with the evil one himself, he was so horribly, indescribably steeped in wickedness.

Ormande read the emotion conflicting on hr face, and his heart leaped at the sight.

Bending forward eagerly he continued his pleading, he lost himself in his task.

Bending forward eagerly he continued his pleading, he lost himself in his task, the light flashed in his eye, the color rose to his check, his intensity of anxiety moved her almost to tears, but she remained motionless through it all. At the end she was silent, not a sound passed her lips save a deep., broken sigh.

Ormande watched her breathlessly.

Ormande watched her breathlessly. Had he won the day? He was almost too excited to breathe.

Katharine aroused herself. She must answer him, and without delay.

"I thank you, Lord Otway." she began, steeling her voice till it was as cold as ice: "I thank you for the undoubted interest that you have always shown in my welfare. Believe me, I—I should be only too glad to respond to your urgings now, but"—her voice broke only for a moment—"but it is—is impossible. Mr. Smythe is ill, and needs me. Please let me pass. It is growing late."

me. Please let me pass. It is growing late."

"Katharine!"—there was a wildness in the ery—"Katharine! Hear me, only hear me! I—I love you so much that I cannot, I dare not let this sin rest on your soul. Will—will you not show me a gleam of that better, nobler nature you possess? Leave this man. Your place is not by his side—his wife comes first. No matter what affection you may have for him, there is always duty. Send for his wife, dear Katharine, and then you will have proved yourself to be the sweet-hearted woman I have always thought you. Come from out the shadow of this sin. Katharine, only promise me this, and I shall be content!"

A CONTROL OF THE PARTY OF THE P

Ormande paused a moment, then moistening his lips, he moved up to her, and came to a standstill just before her.

His heart was bearing mady, wildly. The task he had set himself was greater than he had supposed, but his courage did not fail, nor his purpose falter.

She was there before him in he teuty—the beauty which was not shadowed by the black cloud of shame—her soul was in danger! He must stretch out his hand and save her at once if it was to be done at all.

"Katharine," he said, solemnly, but with his deep love dwelling in every tone. "Wath have you done? Wy poor.

"Lettered and then her voice broke."

you, it—"
She faltered, and then her voice broke altogether, and with a sob she moved to the door and passed slowly out.
"Katharine!" Ormande stretched his hands toward her retreating form.
"Katharine!"

"Katharine!"
Love, deep anguish, stricken love, welled up in his heart again and mingled in his cry of entreaty, but if the girl heard it she took no heed, and the next moment he caught the sound of her voice speaking to the matron as caimly asthough nothing had happened to distress or upset her. With a groan his arms fell to his side heavily, and his head sunk on his breast.

"She has rejected my aid," he said, sorrowfully, to himself, as he sat by the table and buried his face in his hands. "She will not listen to my words. What can I do? What can I do? Sooner, far sooner would I see you dead and in your grave, than have listened to you as you spoke to-day. Oh, Katharine! Katharine! My dear, my only love! Lost to me forever and ever! Our paths must lie apart in this world, my darling. There is a gulf between us that can never be bridged over! Alas! that it should be so; but you have chosen your path and will tread it to its sorrowful, miserable end, while 1—I, who would lay down my life for you—must learn from now to drag your memory from my heart, and so forget you altogether—yes, altogether!"

When Lord Otway reached his quiet home that night he found a letter awaiting him. It was Mr. Montrose, and was written in haste.

"Old Dalrymple died last night," it said, "and I find that he has left every farthing of, his money to the children of his sister. Robert Breeton's wife; so my good offices on behalf of that girl are not needed now, as, of course, being next of kin, she must inherit. I am giad, and yet I am soft inherit. I am awful state of things. I am convinced she never went away of her own free will, her face was too sweet and true to belong to a bad woman; and he, at any rate, must be a villain to have tempted her as he has done. I can not tell you, Otway, how grieved I am about this. I was a firm friend of her father, and I know that this would just have broken his great, noble heart. Can you do nothing? Forgive me for auggesting it, but your vocation seems to fit you more for this task that myself. S do so."

Sister Dora hesitated, she glanced with her heavy eyes from the invalid's ghastly, white face to the scarcely less pallid one of Katharine's.
"You are not fit," she said, involuntarily. "and I am used to this, you know."

"Heaven forbid that you should be used to such a task as has been yours during the last few days. I can not try to thank you, dear Sister Dora. for your goodness in coming back with me yesterday. I shudder to think what I should have done without you."

The nurse took one of Katharine's shender hands in hers, while a slight flush suffused her cheeks. "I do not often falter in my duty," she said, hurriedly, "but—"

Katharine stopped her gently.
"I understand! Ah, yes, I understand so well, and I see now I was selfish to Bring you back, but you are such a comfort to me, such a comfort, you will never know how great."

Sister Dora gently careased the pretty hand she held. There had sprung up in her heart suddenly a great sympathy and affection for this pale, beautiful girl, who called herself wife to the blasphenous bully whose coarse tongue and cruel words had driven her for a time from her task of nursing him. Sister Dora had no need of an interpreter to know that Katharine loathed and feared this man to whom she was bound; the look that came into the girl's fovely eyes sent a pang straight to the nurse's warm, gentle heart, and this look had seemed to deepen during the hours that thad passed since the afternoon of the previous day, when Katharines had found her way to the nursing home to plead for her return.

It was very strong now, that expression of intense, silent anguish, and there were traces, too, on the fair, young face of such suffering as is fortunately rare. Sister Dora, in her life of ministration, had seen as much sorrow as it was possible to see, but she had never before beheld such a look as lived on Katharine Smythe's exquisite face.

"You will make me vain," she said, with a faint smile, though her eyes were wet. "I know I am supposed to be a decent nurse, but you make me out something more, my dear."

Katharine gave no answering smile, but she closed her fingers round the other's hand while she fixed her gaze stendily on the sick man.

"You wall so and rest," she said, softly, after a moment's

Rivers Wilson to Retire From the Montreal, Oct. 11.—The following special cable was received here to-day from London: It is understood on good authority that the arrangement of the Grand Trunk directorate is practically settled. After much trying discussion, Sir Charles Riveas Wilson retires from the Presidency. Suggestions we're pressed on the board that, seeing the recent course of Grand Trunk finances and the exceptionally heavy demands on British investors, the Presidency should remain with an Englishman of acknowledged prominence, selected from outside the present board room, but this suggestion clashed with the obvious necessity of statements, and the exceptionally heavy demands on British discussions arose the present board room, but this suggestion clashed with the obvious necessity of strengthen the hands of Mr. Hays, and the excentive in Canada, by giving them control over the road, comparable with the Obvious necessity of strengthen the hands of Mr. Hays, and the excentive in Canada, by giving them control over the road, comparable with the Obvious necessity of strengthen the hands of Mr. Hays, and the excentive in Canada, by giving them control over the road, comparable with the obvious necessity of statements of the Canadian Pacific excautive.

Out of these discussions arose the proposal that the Grand Trunk follow the Canadian Pacific excautive.

GIRL MURDERED.

Woman Charged With Killing Her For Insurance.

Lockport, N. Y., Oct. 11.—In the Supreme Court to-day the trial of Mrs. Blanche Buzalski, of Niagara Falls, indicted for the murder, in the first degree, of Sophia Kaminski, was begun. About thirty talesman had been examined up to 6 o'clock, resulting in the selection of five jurymen. The defendant is charged with administering areanic to Sophia, a domestic who was in her employ. It is alleged that the Buzalski woman ran employment bureaus in Toronto, Chicago, and Niagara Falls, getting positions for young Polish girls. She claims she brought Sophia from Poland at an expense of $150.

The prosecution charges that Mrs. Buzalski insured the girl's life for $106 and had insured many other girls for whom she got positions. After the girl's death, the Coroner investigated and found forty-three grains of arsenic in the stomach. Mrs. Buzalski claimed she gave the girl some white powders, but under the doctor's orders. The three doct the stomach. Mrs. Buzalski claimed she gave the girl some white powders, but under the doctor's orders. The three doctors in the case were called and it was found that two of the prescriptions left with Mrs. Buzalski for the patient were never filled, but were left on the table in her house.

The prosecution will try to prove that the girl was murdered for the insurance money. Charles E. Cromley, for the defence, will set up the suicide theory.

True Bill Against Drouin.

Quebec, Oct, 11.—The criminal court for the district of Quebec, presided over by Judge Archambault, opened in this city to-day. The calendar is compara-tively light.
