THE REVIVAL OF IRISH MANUFACTURES

The revival to which the despatches bear witness, of interest in the promotion of manufactures in Ireland is a sign of the times which they contemplate with satisfaction. A general movement in England and Ireland in favor of fair trade, and the encouragement of home industries would do much to unite in a common effort for general protection the two classes of English and Irish tradesmen, between whom a gulf has been open for centuries. No matter how favorable the position of Ireland may have been since the Union was accomplished, and trade established on something like even terms, Ireland began the race under the fresh conditions with broken fortunes ruined industries, and a beggared people. The effects of two centuries of misrule were deeply burned in the national body.

There was never any good reason why Ireland should not have attained an almost equal development with England in commerce and manufactures. Her soil was fertile. Her people were frugal and not without ingenuity. Rich pasture land supplied the groundwork of a great cattle trade; and Irish cattle and wool had a high value in the world's then narrower markets. Water power was plenty. And ever opened harbors invited the commerce of the world. The jealousy of English industries took fright early in history, and the commercial ruin of Ireland was speedily accomplished. In the seventeenth century the export to England of cattle and their products in any shape—whether of beef, bacon, butter, or cheese—was forbidden by law. This was, of course, a deadly blow at the main source of Irish means not merely of wealth, but of livlihood. Again, Irish ships at first as fine as those of England, were forbidden to take part in the colonial empire, and no goods were allowed to be imported into Ireland except through English ports, and in English vessels manned by English sailors. Thus, after the destruction of the agricultural interest, the shipping interest was doomed to extinction.

There were still however some manufactures left. The exports of cattle being checked the manufactures of wool became for a time more active than before, in consequence of the determination of the people to preserve some portion of their prosperity but the manufacturing interest of England became alarmed at the progress of Irish industry, and the English manufacturers petitioned for redress of their grievance of Irish rivalry. Their demands were too readily listened to. The House of Lords represented in an address to the King that the manufacture of cloth in Ireland was tempting English people to go [illegible]
