The Chronic Arguer, the Egotist and the Whiner Are . Members of the Bore Family.

Who are the five greatest bores in the world?

Each of us has our own individual list of those who slay us with the jawbone of an ass. I head mine with the chronic arguer.

To him, for the arguer is nearly always of the male persuasion, any subject is as good for a controversy as a nickel is for in them, and he never rests until he drags forth every possible fault that they may possess. In religion and politics he is always on the other side, and no matter what you say you always start something.

In society the arguer is a bore of the ten-inch auger variety. He is a mustard plaster on the bosom of friendship, and as a husband he is first aid to divorce.

Next to the arguer in the line of bores I place the egotists.

Both male and female He created them, and endowed them with an unshakable belief that the balance of their fellow creatures are just hungering and thirsting to hear every detail of their private lives and every single solitary thing about their wives, and husbands, and children, and cooks, and houses, and

They but to the proper to you while they repeat to you the infantile wittleisms of the baby, and recount to you the doings of school girls and boys. They fix you with their glittering eyes while they are formed and the same thanks and the same trock of blonde georgette with shoes and hose to match. A cloth coat of a slightly deeper tone, handsomely trimmed with natural lynx, and a small velvet hat to match, enriched with flowers in the autumn shades of bronze and gold, completed her costume.

Surely God will forgive many sins to us who listen with patience while the egotists tell us all about themselves.

Next to the egotists I put the whiners.

They come and camp on your living-room chairs and bedew you with their tears while they tell you their hard-luck stories. It makes you tired just to look at them. Their faces are sagged down, their shoulders are slumped. Their clothes always stand in need of soap and water and a good hot iron, and you couldn't buck them up with a

The home of Mr. and Mrs. John The home of Mr. and Mrs. John H. a ginger cake.

You can't remark that it is a pleasant day without his disputing it and hurling upon you an avalanche of statistics to prove that the mean temperature is something or other when it should be something else.

If you say you like a play or a book, you are promptly told that you know nothing of drama and have no taste in literature. If you make any plan, the arguer pounces upon it and tears it into shreds. If you find any one charming or any place delightful, he can see no good in them, and he never rests until he forms.

The repeater not only tells you the same story over a thousand times and makes exactly the same remarks under the same circumstances every day of his of her life, but he or she recounts to you every item news in the daily paper, which you have already read, and repeat the jokes in the humorous magazines. Furthermore, the repeater is addicted to the vicious habit of reading aloud, which is the unforgivable sin.

him. Yes, sir, Ol' Mistah Buzzard brought someone with him. No one knew it at the time because no one happened to see him when he arriv-ed in the Green Forest at his favorite tall, dead tree. The fact that he had brought someone with him was the beginning of his secret. Of course, that part of his secret wasn't kept very long. Peter Rabbit never will forget his surprise when he discovered the first part of this secret.

It had happened that that spring morning Peter had failed to go home to the dear Old Briar-patch. So he had made himself comfortable over in the Green Forest and planned to spend the day there near the toll dead tree which Ol' Mistah Buzzard uses as his favorite perch. Peter, having been out all night, was sleepy, and he was soon dozing. He was hidden under some tall ferns. He felt quite safe there. Otherwise he wouldn't have been so careless as to doze. From time to time he would awaken just enough to open his eyes and peep out through the ferns.

From where he sat he could look right up to the very top of the tall dead tree, which was known as Ol' Mistah Buzzard's tree. It had only two or three stubs of old branches. When Peter awoke after his first nap and peeped out, no one was on that the second time he awoke and peeped out, there on his favorite perch out, there on his favorite perch sat Ol' Mistah Buzzard's habits so well that he was sure Ol' Mistah Buzzard how glad ne was to see him. But Peter was rapping. Peter was tempted to run right over to the foot of that tree and tell Ol' Mistah Buzzard how glad ne was to see him. But Peter was still yery, very sleepy. He knew Ol' Mistah Buzzard would certainly want a rest after his long journey. "Till finish my nap. Afterward I'll go pay my respects to Ol' Mistah Buzzard would certainly want a rest after his long journey. "Till finish my nap. Afterward I'll go pay my respects to Ol' Mistah Buzzard' would certainly want a rest after his long journey. "Till finish my nap. Afterward I'll go pay my respects to Ol' Mistah Buzzard' he ought to have a lot of news about the folks down in the Sunny South," said Peter to himself. So Peter closed his eyes and dozed off again. When he opened them the next time there at Ol' Mistah Buzzard just where he had expected to see him. Peter was still sleepy. He tipped back his to the dear Old Briar-patch. So he had made himself comfortable over in the Green Forest and planned to
