This terrible exclusion lying Edward. "Brother," exclai y. "I have murd PHANTON OF STOLBERG.

The illustrious Baron of Atterkeim dwelt at the Castle of Stolberg. He was old and a widower with one child—the beautiful Hildegarde, whose hand was sought in marriage by all the nobles of the neighborhood. Among them was the young Count of Frauburg, the hand-somest knight of the province; but her father had forbidden him to appear at the castle, and he had disappeared, no one knew whither.

castle, and he had disappeared, no one knew whither. Two noble knights from the banks of the Rhine presented themselves at the Castle of Stolberg. Edward and Her-mann, brothers. The latter was hand-some, brave and accomplished. He came to lay his fortune at the feet of the beauti-ful heiress and soon obtained her father's consent.

ful heiress and soon obtained her father's consent.
Hildegarde's attendants said that after a long interview with the baron, in which he announced to her his decision, she had wept long and bitterly.^a But she dreaded her parent too much to dare resist his will.
The marriage day was fixed, and Hermann, though at the summit of felicity, could not but perceive that Edward was restless and unhappy.
Brother, " said he, "what I have long dreaded has at last happened. The appreart the wedding day approached the more gloomy Edward became; though Hermann, absorbed in his lore, only had eyes for his bride.
The Baron Atterkeim has given orders that the wedding feast should be remarked on his countenance: Hermann observed it and inquired the cause.
"My friend," replied the baron, "you

"My friend," replied the baron, "you will perhaps blame my superstitious cre-dulity. Learn that for many centuries an heirees of Stolberg has never married without the consent of the founder of our race, the first Baron of Atterkeim, formerly known by the name of the Bronze Soldier. An ancient tradition runs as follows: When the marriage of a daughter of our line is to be followed by any misfortune, the Bronze Soldier rises from his tomb and appears the night before the ill-omened ceremony, under the walls of the castle, where he blows three blasts on his bugle at mid-night. My family, from father to son, has believed in the apparition, and were I to hear his fatal clarion, I must refuse you Hildegarde."

I to hear his fatal clarion, I must refuse you Hildegarde." When Herman retired to his chamber, he sent for his brother—Edward was not to be found. Herman felt the want of a friend, an adviser. News of an alarming nature had been communicat-ed to him—he had heard that the Count of Frauburg was lurking in the vicinity of the castle. of the castle

It was the day before that appointed for the wedding. The countenance of Hildegarde wore an unusual expression —it denoted alternately security and anxiety, calmness and agitation; she had never appeared so submissive to her father—so affectionate to her betrothed; and Hermann vibrated between uneasi-ness and hope—doubt and confidence. The bugle of the Bronze Soldier was never absent from his thoughts. If it were heard that night! He resolved to pass the night under the window of Hil-degarde, and to stand sentinel over the castle.

The household had been long wrapt in sleep, when Hermann, completely arm-
