ROYAL CANADIAN BANK.

THE proposed amalgamation between the Royal Canadian and the embryo Dominion Bank can hardly be looked upon as an amalgamation, but rather as an increase of the capital of the former institution. The Dominion Bank has as yet, so far as we know, no paid up capital beyond what was necessary to enable its proprietors to obtain a charter, and it certainly has no "good will" to carry over to the Royal Canadian. That additional capital will give greater strength and more scope to that Bank is that account can offer superior inducements to our certain, but in no other way will it gain by the intended combination.

On public and general grounds there can be no possible objection to the strengthening of any of the second-class banks—second-class as to actual resources we mean, of course; for the more abundant the banking capital of the country becomes, the cheaper will money become and the more readily will it be invested in productive enterprise. Bankers may not be any more ready to lend money for permanent investments, nor any more justified in doing so than they are now; but the more abundantly the banks are prepared to supply the circulating capital required in carrying on the trade of the country, the interchange and distribution of imports and home manufactures, of the products of the soil, of the mines and of the forest, so much the more will be set free of the other uninvested savings of the country to carry on enterprises requiring the investment of fixed capital, and its transmutation into permanent forms of wealth.

We hope then to see the so-called amalgamation take place—we believe it is a tolerably certain event—and while it gives increased confidence to the public in their dealings with the Royal Canadian, enable that Bank to extend its sphere of usefulness and give increased facilities to the mercantile community of Ontario.
