Last Year's Frocks Made New.

Some very practical advice is given Some very practical advice is given by Vogue to the girl who must manage economically in order to dress well. The fashion paper says:

The attractive fashion of the tucked net or chiffon sleeve has made possible the remodeling of many a frock that otherwise could not have been attempted and in many cases the half-skeeves so lengthoused have proved prettier and ed and in many cases the half-siceves so lengthened have proved prettier and more becoming than when the waist was new. To make these sleeves in tucks three times the length from shoulder to wrist must be allowed, unless the needle-woman is an adept at plecing, and then she must choose a tuck near the elbow to hide the joining under, for the width of chiffon or net is so great that three pairs of sleeves is so great that three pairs of sleeves of medium size (for 30 bust) may be cut from it, if managed "up and down," and the tucks all the same size. A and the tucks all the same size. A pretty new way of tucking, much used in the imported models, is to graduate the widths, the widest tuck at sleeve top, the narrowest at wrist. When the tucked piece is put in from the half-sleeve, the tucks are all of the same width.
