Murder and Misfeasance.

"How in God's name you're up" is an injunction frequently addressed by boys to their fellows, and serves to show that the love of notoriety is early developed. But the doctor to get one's name up in nothing in comparison with the desire to keep it up after it has once attained an elevated position. How the thought of the place he would fill in history made him sweat the last hours of Jack Sheppard, and made Clarendon look upon the instructions of his taking off with a kindly eye! If they possess how their names would live when those of the titled magnates of their time had sunk into oblivion they must "approach their graves like one who wraps the drapery of his sepulchre about him and lies down to pleasant dreams." So great is the desire to perpetuate good or evil notoriety. One of the most striking instances of this kind has just occurred in Ohio. Rev. Samuel Browne was a rich and obscure resident of Cumminsville, who had never tasted the joy of seeing his name in associated print telegrams, not to mention "specials" from his own correspondent, and he shot a little boy dead who invaded his orchard, and found himself famous in his old age. He had converted sinners from the error of their ways, had fearlessly hurled denunciations across the Atlantic ocean at the Pope and his Cardinals, had convicted the professors of every ism except his own of being sheer without a shepherd; and yet he never became famous until he killed the boy. He probably bought all the papers containing accounts of his exploit, and made a scrap-book of favorable legends that had acquired. Browne is a common name, even when spelled with an 'n', and he wished for a more distinctive cognomen—sighed often when revelling in his new-found fame that he had not had it changed before the deed was done. He, however, resolved to make the most of it, so he provided in his will for the establishment of a university to bear his name and perpetuate his fame. He then died either from inability to support his honors, or chagrin at finding the papers devoted to the Alabama question, the Presidential election, and the arrest of Billy Forester for the early establishment of the university. He leaves $150,000, a lot of land, and revenues for the endowment of a Professorship.—Browne Professorship in Browne University.

It is fortunate for Browne that his name is not less common, as everybody will ask "What Browne?" when first hearing of the bequest or looking upon the University, and will be answered "Old Browne who murdered the little boy who stole his apples." Thus the fame he seemed to love will be perpetuated by the very commonness of the name he bore, and he will be happy—as happy as his surroundings in the land of shadows will permit him to be.

If this Rev. Samuel Browne had lived out his days without becoming notorious, the probability is that he would not have thought himself worthy of enduring a monument as a University, but would have left his property to his heirs at law. The boy did, therefore, that a University might arise from his grave.

SCALPED.—A rumor has reached us from Fenimore to the effect that a party of Americans, amongst whom was the notorious O'Donoghue, have all been shot and scalped by Indians on the Plains. If it is true we are sorry for the Americans, but do not think that many tears will be shed in Canada for the well-deserved fate of the ex-Vice-President.—[Montreal Gazette.]

A Blind Member of Parliament.

Justin McCarthy's blind London letter to the New York Mail, says:—Mr. Fawcett, who is one of our most rising men in Parliament, accomplished two or three days ago what may be fairly called a remarkable, perhaps even an extraordinary feat. He spoke on the subject of the Government of our Indian Empire, in reply to the speech of Mr. Grant Duff, the Under Secretary of State for India—spoke for nearly four hours, introducing masses of figures and long citations from official documents into his speeches, making a statistical argument, and all this, of course, without a note or memorandum of any kind to assist him, for Mr. Fawcett is blind. I heard the speech, and it was a splendid delivery, as close and symmetrical in argument as exact in its array of figures and quotations as though it were from a book. Not once did the speaker stumble in a sentence or go back to set right an incoherent figure. I think it was a performance which may almost be called unparalleled. Few men in the House, blessed with the full use of all their senses could have accomplished it as skillfully as Mr. Fawcett is decidedly making a remarkable way in Parliament. Personally his blindness does not trouble him, but it is a full of healthy animal spirits as a school-boy, and he delights in all manner of exercise. He is fond of taking long walks; he has been seen to go down stairs, and then to be helped up again, and he has been seen to get into a motor car, and then to be helped out again. He has been seen to go to a public house, and to be helped into a chair. He has been seen to go to a public house, and to be helped into a chair. He has been seen to go to a public house, and to be helped into a chair.

Sherman's Attack on William.

Gen. W. T. Sherman has returned from his European tour, and has undergone an interview. He has the most favorable opinion of the permanence of the French Republic, as a good citizen of a republic should, and trembles for the fate of Germany when Bismarck is transplanted to his celestial abode. He says:—"United Germany, in my opinion, is destined long to exist a controlling influence in Europe. It is still, however, a matter of doubt whether a combination, held together by a single hand, will not fall to pieces at that hand's withdrawal; an event which would have been a terrible calamity to Europe. It is a matter of doubt whether a combination, held together by a single hand, will not fall to pieces at that hand's withdrawal; an event which would have been a terrible calamity to Europe. It is a matter of doubt whether a combination, held together by a single hand, will not fall to pieces at that hand's withdrawal; an event which would have been a terrible calamity to Europe."

The Congressmen who were charged with having bribed with credit Mobilizer stock kept an almost unbroken silence on the subject, whether by advice of counsel, or not, we cannot say. Some supposed they were taking time for consultation, so that all would be sure to give the same explanation of the statement sworn to by Col. McComb as has been given him by the Hon. Oakes Ames, but it seems that they have been waiting for Oakes to speak. He has at last opened his mouth and delivered an address to his constituents, in which he gives an unqualified denial to the statements of the New York Sun that he gave stock to members of Congress to induce favorable legislation. He states that these charges were made several years ago and answered under oath, at the time, by himself and other gentlemen of the highest responsibility and character; that there was no truth in the charges; that the list of names given as the recipients of stock on the back of his letter were not written or furnished by him, and the statement made that he had given or shown such list of names is unqualifiedly false.

Mrs. Fair.

The second trial of Laura D. Fair, for the murder of A. F. Crittenden, is now taking place in the Supreme Court. The circumstances re-awaken an interest in the history of this remarkable case. The murder occurred nearly two years ago, and the first trial, which was held in the spring of 1871, resulted in a verdict of guilty. Mrs. Fair was accordingly sentenced to death, and the execution was to have taken place in July, 1871. But the United States Supreme Court, on appeal, reversed the verdict of the jury, and ordered a new trial. The new trial was held in the fall of 1871, and Mrs. Fair was again found guilty, and sentenced to death. This time the execution was carried out on the 17th of July, 1872. The case has since become a classic in legal history, and has attracted the attention of the world.

The Award Condemned.

The English Opposition journals displayed the most admirable temper during the critical days of the Treaty of Washington, and remained firm in their support of the Government. Now that the matter is settled they feel at liberty to make all the party capital they can, and are denouncing the result of the arbitration in resounding invective.

St. John's Hall Banquet.

The throng grows greater each night at St. John's Hall, and the receipts were starting a new bank. The perfunctory of the ladies is something extraordinary, and if every one of the field in election could have a similar portion of the community would play rich goods, and some very handsome worked chains are in the lottery. It is utterly impossible to give a clear idea of the extent of the display, as while one is gazing for a moment at some work of art, the curiosity seeker is rather sharply handled by a boy of young ladies who speedily relieve him of all his cash and rarely give him any other than salted cotton. Any one who wants to know all about the different prices of tickets should attend at once. It would be an improvement if some of the windows were opened and some fresh air admitted occasionally.
