WHAT A MAN LIKES.

is what a man likes: a blue sky and a stream. He'll paddle off yonder and the shore with gold gleam. He'll west wing gently blowing for men the business sure. He'll tend to share the glory and a bass to take the lure.

is what a man likes: a day away from things. He'll where dreams are golden and malice never stings. He'll spend to read his heart to, who'll keep the tale secure. He'll feel that's running freely and a bass to take the lure.

is what a man likes: a chance to test his skill. He'll hazard of disaster and a struggle's surging thrill. He'll joy of honest hunger and hardships to endure. He'll gulls to fly above him and a bass to take the lure.

is what a man likes: a friend to share his boat. He'll freedom of the open, an old and shabby coat. He'll all the aches of failure, 'tis here he finds a cure. He'll want God made for fishing, and a bass to take the lure.

The Joys of Mountaineering

MEMBERSHIP THAT FACE EXPLORERS IN HIGH ALTITUDES.

People who climb amid the eternal peaks for scientific and other reasons have many discomforts to contend with.

The official photographer on the first Everest climb in 1922, Mr. G. Finch, in his book, "The Making of Mountaineer," tells of the difficulty he had sometimes in developing his prints. The solution contained in the tanks had to be maintained at the proper temperature. Often the only way to accomplish this was to retire one's sleeping bag with the tin, as in the case might be, as bed.

Today the films, so that the water does not freeze on them in the process, it was necessary to close the tin as hermetically as possible, the temperature being kept above freezing-point by means of lighted candles.

When clothes were thawed out dried at the same time. At a lofty altitude, the air is so dry and rarefied that ice evaporates as readily as water does on a hot summer's day. When garments were hammered flat and stood in a vertical position against the wall of stones.

The moment they collapsed and fell to the ground it was obvious that their weight of ice had disappeared and they were, therefore, dry.

In Tibet, the yak is the transport animal. He can live on the coarsest grass, and his pace is about two miles an hour. To hustle a yak serves no real purpose, for he simply gets maddened, and proceeds to throw off his load preparatory to running away.

The proper way to drive yaks seems to be to let them open out in extended lines, the drivers walking behind.

On the march it is up to the yak to whistle soft, lullaby airs. If he lacks of moisture on the lips, or if he lacks of breath, the whistling yaks for any length of time, the yak whistles, and there is usually trouble.

On the Everest expedition, donkeys were used as additional transport animals. The way lay over extensive plateaus, into which some of the pack animals sank deeply, little but nose, ears and tail remaining above the slime. In such cases the customary procedure was for the loads to be shifted, after which three drivers followed themselves at all three corners of the donkey, one at each ear, and the third at the tail. Then it was simply a case of heave-ho! until the animal emerged with a noise like drawing a cork from a bottle.

The Tibetans are not addicted to cleanliness. A noble informed Mr. Finch with great pride that he had two baths, one on the day of his birth and the other on the day of his death.

A thunderstorm among the snows will produce a curious phenomenon. Holding up his hand one stormy night Mr. Finch heard a noise like the tearing of linen, while from each water issued a blue stream of light.

Rubber in Coal

True vulcanized rubber is the novel discovery made in German deposits of lignite. The yellowish-brown fibrous masses occasionally found have been known to miners as "ape hairs," and their true character has been but recently proven by E. Kindscher. The substance exists in the network of connecting tubes in the plants, and in the process of decay and coal-forming it has shrunk into thin interwoven threads, resisting the change that has converted the lignite into coal. Sulphur compounds released by the transformation have vulcanized the threads.
