

HELEN MOIR
—OR—
LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XX.

DAVID BRIDGEMAN TELLS HIS STORY.
"Ha!" exclaimed Edwin, "I could not think how you could become connected with such an odious wretch."
"That was the beginning of my acquaintance with him. I never particularly liked him, but I attributed his cynical character to the malformation of his body, and pitied him rather than otherwise. I knew him to be void of all sympathy and tenderness of feeling. I knew he had a strange pleasure in beholding and aggravating the sufferings of others, but I did not believe him to be capable of such treachery as he has manifested within these few days. However, it is not of him that I now require to speak, so much as of his master, Philip Jerdan."

"Ere long the small sums I from time to time received from him amounted to something considerable, and this was a new uneasiness added to my distraction. Of Glenfruin and Helen I could not now think but with a shudder, and when the thought did intrude I strove to banish it with frantic effort. My anxiety and restlessness grew insupportable. Solitude I could not endure, and a desire to rush into excitement of some kind came restlessly upon me. At this juncture, Jerdan wanted me to go with him one evening, and I eagerly accepted the invitation. I knew not where we were going, nor into what society; I only hoped and expected that it would be where I should enjoy a respite from the gnawing pain of my own thoughts, and was careless as to all else. Jaquin accompanied us, following a few paces behind, and after passing along several thoroughfares, we entered a quiet street, and about the centre of it Jerdan led the way into a dingy building. Presently we found ourselves in a long dark passage, Jerdan walking first, I immediately behind him, and Jaquin closely following. At the end of the passage was a door which seemed to open of itself, for it turned noiselessly on its hinges as we approached without even knock or signal being made, and so soon as we three had passed within, it closed again in the same silent mysterious manner. We were now in a lobby or ante-room, lighted by a large lamp in the centre, and on the other side was a door covered with green baize, at the side of which sat a man in a large leather chair."

"To this door Jerdan walked, beckoning me to follow, which I did with perfect unconcern, and wholly unsuspecting of the kind of scene to which I was about to be introduced. But the opening of the door revealed it, and at a glance I understood its nature, for all the features told me that the gambling table, with all its surroundings was before me."
"The room was long and lofty. It was brilliantly lighted, and large mirrors reflected and reproduced it everywhere. There were two or three tables, each surrounded by a group of men, and by their eager, flushed, compressed faces, or which hope and triumph rested, the nature of their occupation could be guessed."

"Jerdan glanced at me to see, no doubt, if I understood the nature of the place, and how I received the revelation. Would to God I had turned away from it in horror. I did shake my head in disapprobation, at which Jerdan laughed and whispered that he dropped in now and then just to see the fun."
"I know two or three of the fellows a little," he added. "Come forward and I'll introduce you."
"No—I would rather not, I remonstrated, but my resistance was feeble and ineffectual, and under the grasp of his hand and his firm persuasive manner I was drawn forward to one of the tables, and to my excessive surprise Jerdan introduced me to the players under the name of Waldgrave Winthrop."

"Why did he do this I could not conjecture. He told me in a private whisper that he thought I might prefer to conceal my real name there, and as I had already passed under this other name in Scotland, it had naturally suggested itself to him."
"My story has now reached the verge of the dreadful catastrophe, and I cannot approach the narration of the occurrence in that room that night without a cold sweat breaking upon me."
"And in truth as he spoke round beads of perspiration began to gather on Bridgeman's brow, his breath came fast and quick, and an expression of pain, amounting to agony, passed over his face."

"Helen, with a woman's gentle, tender touch, took her handkerchief and wiped the moisture from his brow."
"Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites will speedily and certainly arrest the depressing influence of disease upon the nerves and muscles. It restores the appetite and induces a disposition to take on healthy flesh. It causes the formation of living blood, strengthening the action of both Heart and Lungs. It sustains the system under trying circumstances, and causes the healthy development of all the organs necessary to our existence."
"We notice that the agricultural papers all over the country recommend the use of Sheridan's Catary Condition Powders."
—Exchange.
Farmers and others in this section have long known and appreciated the advantage of these powders over all others."
