MADAME'S WARD

BY PAULINE BEVERLY.

CHAPTER XL.

Sitting in one of the faded arm-chairs in York's den at Redpots, I was making a fool of myself. My friend and I had just met, and somehow I had broken down to my own great disgust and astonishment, and was blubbering like an idiot. As for Roger, he stared at me for a minute, laughed, coughed, and finally walked away to the window, then walked away to the window, standing there with his back to me until such time as I could laugh myself which was just as quickly as I could manage, without fear of a relapse. Then he wheeled round and came back to the fire again.

"Feel better?" he asked, and laughed; but I saw that his own eyes were nothing to boast of in the way of dryness.

"Rather! I'm an awful fool, old man," I added, apologetically, "but upon my honor I couldn't help it!"

"All right, my boy," he said, "You see, I went on, 'the whole thing has been so sudden, and the difference between today and a couple of days ago is so tremendous, that upon my word it quite knocked me over!' I tell you that even now when I see you it is as much as I can do to realize the whole thing hasn't been an angry sort of dream."

"Ah!"—and for a moment a heavy look crossed his face, which bore traces plain enough to be seen of those few days' mental agony that he had suffered. "I found it a very ugly reality. Ned, my boy, there it is over; let it alone for the present, at any rate. It was rough enough while it lasted; but, if it did nothing else, it showed me that there were some people who required a little more than what they call 'conclusive proof' to believe me a villain. There"—and he frowned again—"I did not mean to let that word slip. It is harder than I meant to be upon the poor fellow who is gone."

"I don't know about that, Roger," I said, kindling rather at the unexpected compassion that expressed itself in the softened tone of his voice—"but Jove! I don't, I'm awfully sorry for the fellow, of course; but I can't forget that he let you suffer, and never moved a finger to help you. That was all over with him. I don't know, after all, what you can call him if not a villain!"

"I know," he answered, looking around at me, "how I myself felt toward Froude; and I don't know, had my blood been the lava that his was, what I might not have done. The same, perhaps—I wouldn't answer for it. It's no credit to me and Ned, my boy, that our heads are cooler and our self-control is stronger—an accident of birth and temperament, that's all. And I don't find it hard to forgive a man whose worst crime, after all, was that he loved a woman madly and passionately."

I did not reply, perhaps not agreeing exactly, and we were silent for awhile. York, looking thoughtfully into the fire, and I watching him, wondering how I should begin to tell him what I wanted to say, and what I guessed that he expected me to say. Of much the same kind, the tawdry tawdry during the past few days—which had had incidents for as many weeks crowded into them—I knew he was cognizant already—mademoiselle and mademoiselle's theft, flight and confession, for one thing. That the secret which he had kept for her was now known to us all, he, of course, was aware of; but there was still something which I had to tell him—something which had that morning been told me, and to my very great astonishment.

I knew now who had been the second witness to the meeting between Roger and the governess in the Lady's Walk, who had managed to insinuate a poisonous tale into the passionate, reckless head of poor little Nat, on the morning of that unlucky ball; and I must say that, if I had been offered the whole population of Whitteford to guess from, I should never have hit upon the right person. It was not Fraser Froude, as York had suspected, but Phil Flood, the blacksmith.

Yes, it was he, of all people in the world, whom my friend had to thank for the "going away" of his love affairs. How it had first come about I cannot pretend to say, but it is certain that for some reason Phil Flood had taken it into his obstinate, stupid head to turn insanely jealous of Roger York. Whether Miss Lott, with her teasing, childish, flitting ways, was to blame for it I do not know, but somehow the young blacksmith had got it into his head that York was secretly making love to his sweetheart, and was trying to take her from him.

If any one was to blame in the matter when it commenced, no doubt it was Miss Lott herself. She was a vain little thing, and loved to tease her sulky suitor, as all Whitteford knew.

It seemed that she had used a real or feigned admiration of York's handsome face to drive Flood nearly wild, and a jealousy that was little short of sheer insanity seized him. Believing that York took advantage of his attendance upon her father to make love to the girl, the young fool had absolutely made it his business to dog him at all times and seasons, rarely indeed letting him out of his sight when he was in the neighborhood of Wilde's cottage. This was the origin of the freak of lurking about Redpots and lounging about the patch of common.

On the night when mademoiselle made her first appearance at Chavasse Flood was hanging about as usual when Roger came out to keep the appointment of which I have had to say so much already. Partly because in his jaundiced eyes everything that York either did or left undone was suspicious, partly from sheer idle curiosity, he followed him, saw him enter the park, and partly overheard as well as saw the interview in the Lady's Walk. Presumably he made nothing of it, and he did not appear to have mentioned or thought of it again until after Nat's accident, when he had been carried senseless into Wilde's cottage by York.

Now whether, as I said before, that little simper of a Lott was really in love with York, or whether she had been vain enough to suppose that some few complimentary jesting speeches which I dare say he had made her meant that he was in love with her, it certainly seemed that the little thing had taken it into her head to be jealous on her own score—jealous, of course, of the very obvious state of affairs between Roger and Natalie. And she had not only done that, but had absolutely poured out a string of incoherent complaints and accusations to Flood. What that thick-headed mortal imagined to be really the matter I, of course, cannot say; but he was evidently full of his injuries and fuddled with beer on the day when he had presented himself to Madame at the Mount and puzzled her by his complaint, that he had been wronged by Dr. York.

But Flood must have been more fuddled still on the morning of the ball, when, seeing Natalie standing waiting for me by the gate in the park, he had absolutely had the impudence to retell to her Miss Lott's accusations and complaints—within some nice little additions of his own, no doubt—and had wound up by telling her a fine riddle of the bustling in the Lady's Walk, which he had lain hidden to overhear. Nat, angry, perplexed, passionate and suspicious, had listened at first indignantly incredulous, and then doubtful, afterward attacking me, when I appeared in the fashion which I have already described. Of course, I had, like the fool I was, blurted out the truth about the story so far as it concerned mademoiselle; and Nat, taking goodness knows what wild notions into her jealous little head, had swallowed the whole thing as something quite too dreadful to mention, had had been most awfully deceived, had torn up Roger's letter, cut him at the ball, accepted Fraser Froude, and, in fact, conducted herself like the jealous, unreasonable, passionate, headstrong little mortal she was when she liked.

STORMS IN EUROPE

The East of France and Switzerland Are Suffering.

Paris, Jan. 19. — Storms of exceptional violence have been raging for the past 48 hours, the centre being in the east of France. Rivers have overflowed their banks in many places. Belfort is completely under water, and Moselle is partly flooded.

Geneva, Jan. 19. — The scores of Alpine visitors at the fashionable Alpine resorts are imprisoned indefinitely on account of the heavy continuous rains. Such a condition has never been known before in Switzerland. In the upper regions the snowfall measured from three to ten feet, and large sections of the mountain railroads have been washed out or buried under the snow. Miles of wires are down, and it will take weeks to repair the damage. The wind blew at times at the rate of 110 miles an hour. A dozen towns and a score of villages are suffering from the floods, torrents running through the streets. No deaths are reported thus far.

PALLADINO TRICKY

Harvard Professor Says That Noted Medium Is a Fraud.

Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 20.—Professor Hugo Munsterberg, the eminent Harvard psychologist, declares that Madame Palladino, who has been giving lifting exhibitions before select audiences in Boston and New York as a fraud.

To a reporter, describing his experience, the Harvard scientist said: "This woman is a deception. I made a private examination of Madame Palladino, and I caught her in a number of tricks which were simply the usual spiritualist manifestations to which they are so well accustomed. The madame is suffering from hysteria of the worst kind."

The reason that previous investigators were deceived by her is that they were all persons of great suggestibility and were acted upon by Madame Palladino's suggestion.

The woman possesses great suggestive powers for certain purposes. The breezes which those observers coming from her forehead were merely the result of their great suggestive power. Her principal trick, that of table lifting, known to scientists as levitation, was done with her own hands."

Professor Munsterberg is the first who ever claimed to have actually detected Mme. Palladino.

WIGLE SUES TOWNSHIP.

Kingsville, Jan. 20.—Darius Wigle has started a $6,000 suit against the township of Gosfield South for losses he claims to have suffered through the flooding of his land. He declares the flooding took place because a creek near his place was blocked.

TOO MUCH OVERLOADING

One Cause of the Many Accidents to Lake Freight Craft.

Detroit, Jan. 20.—In the president's annual address at the opening of the annual convention of the Lake Carriers' Association here today, William Livingstone, of Detroit, declared that friction between the vessel owners and their employees had been greatly reduced since the adoption of the carriers' open shop policy. Nearly 8,000 employees had taken advantage of the association's "welfare plan," said President Livingstone.

Last season's business on the lakes was characterized as very satisfactory, especially for owners of the smaller vessels, but Mr. Livingstone predicted a banner season for 1910.

That overloading vessels is the cause of the largest percentage of accidents on the great lakes was brought out by the speakers at today's meeting of the Great Lakes Protective Association. To relieve owners of strongly constructed ships from paying premiums on losses to lower grade ships, a classification committee similar to that of the shovels was recommended.

Speaking of the cause of lake disasters, A. W. Wright said: "Many vessels on the lakes are going far beyond the safety limit owing to their hatch construction. At the bottom of the trouble is the anxiety of the owner to get the maximum load, and the greatest number of trips, and the captain, who is trying to beat his competitors and make the best time. As it is, we have all got to contribute for the other man's nerve."

ATROCIOUS MURDER IN CHICAGO RESORT

Woman From St. Louis Found Dead With Head Cut Off.

Chicago, Jan. 20.—An atrocious murder was investigated today, when the dejected and mutilated body of Anna Furlong, who was also known as Jennie Cleghorn, 24 years of age, was found in a resort in West Seventeenth street.

The woman came here from St. Louis seven months ago. She was living apart from her husband and had been an inmate of the resort for several weeks.

The head evidently was carried away by the murderer in an attempt to conceal the identity of the victim. The body was mutilated in a most revolting manner. A knife, seven inches long, with a wooden handle, was found concealed beneath the mattress, and
