Genuineness in the Teacher

There is nothing more attractive to young people than genuineness. As a rule, they hate shams, and have, indeed, an instinct for discerning them. It is next to impossible to fool boys and girls. Their powers of analysis are really as yet powers of intuition, and are almost unerring in their aim. Even a babe can discern in the eyes of a grown person whether or not he be a true lover of children. If he be not such truly, no amount of performing will attract the child; but if he be such sincerely, the child will be attracted despite certain aspects which grown people would expect to prove repellant. If one would select in any community the man whom all the boys would single out as a man to be admired for his manly qualities, he would find him to be some good, candid, honest, upright man who, despite perhaps some untoward manners, is felt to be a genuine character. Indeed, young people can bear almost anything better than a lack of genuineness.

On this account it is of the utmost importance that all who have in hand the direction of children and youth should be of this character.—Sunday School Magazine.
