HOME RULE. The submission of the Home Rule Bill reaches the house of Lords, who number a large majority of peers opposed, both by principle and education, to any measure granting local government privileges to Ireland, and who, under the leges to Ireland, and who, under the

the most dangerous opponents of the measure. A writer in Donahoe's Magazine for April gives a very able review of the historical attitude assumed by the House of Lords towards great measures of popular reform in the past, and prophesies their probable action regarding the Home Rule bill when it is submitted to the Home Rule bill when it is submitted to the same and the remains of some the Home Rule bill when it is submitted to the same and the remains of some the same and the same and the remains of some the same and the same and the remains of some the same and the same

From these instances, the writer argues that it is not to be obstinate opposition of the House of Lords that is most to be feared by the advocates of Home Rule. Their present leader Lord Salisbury, is known as a moderate, cautious and strate cistic statesman, rather than a bold and contact the states of the statesman, rather than a bold and contact the statesman, rather than a bold and contact the statesman and protections.

He knows as well as any man that, although the peers may exercise their right of veto once or even twice, they must eventually succumb to the determined reiterations of the House of Commons, and for that reason he may probably not advise a veto of the measure at all. The course which he is most likely to adopt, and which would be far the more dangerous to the success of the Home Rule bill, will be to pass it with certain amendments destroying its most salutary and efficacious provisions; and in that manner, while apparently and formally agreeing to the bill, rob it of all that makes it values of the success of the Home Rule bill, will be the bill, rob it of all that makes it values and the construction of the province.
