THE PROTECTION OF PRESS AND PUBLIC

Mrs. Edward Hasell, convener of the advertising committee, "Made in Canada" How Legal Procedure Robs Both of Rights Supposed to Be Enjoyed Under Modern Libel Law.

The Times has been in receipt of so many congratulations on the satisfactory outcome of the libel suit, in which it was the defendant, and which was dismissed with costs, that it takes this public manner of expressing its gratitude not only to those who offered their felicitations on the event, but to the business men and ladies who so cheerfully contributed their evidence to vindicate the position of the paper.

The trial being concluded and judgment delivered, the time is not inopportune to point out some features of the practice and administration of law in this country which seem to the lay mind to be little less than enormities. These features are not new developments; they have been alluded to in general terms from time to time in this newspaper; but the suit just closed furnish concrete cases which will, perhaps, throw the matters complained of into stronger relief.

It has been customary in recent years for the British public to refer in terms of satisfaction to the evolution of the law of libel from its old, harsh and unjust condition to its present reasonable and rational form. Necessarily a libel is something which is difficult to accurately define even in a profession where exact expression is supposed to have attained its most perfect form. It also admits of more latitude of interpretation than any other offence mentioned in the code, and hence its determination frequently presents a perplexing task to the courts.

Allowing for all these things, it must be conceded that the law of libel to-day, though perhaps capable of improvement, is at least fairly just, and that it serves to a great extent to protect both the newspapers and the public. The latter is immune from malicious attacks with impunity by the former; the former from persecution at the hands of any portion of the latter.

But despite these facts, there is still something radically wrong, not with the law itself, but with attendant procedure. The process of law has become so complex, so capable of indefinite prolongation, so cumbered with precedent and authority, that it is a grave question if its primitive principles are not often utterly ignored. Centuries of practice have created a condition with respect to civil law, analogous to that with which the Scribes and Pharisees hedged about the moral law centuries ago. And as the libel suit of Wiles vs. Times illustrates some of these, a brief reference to that case may be of interest.

In July, 1903, the Times published an article, carefully worded, drawing attention to the canvass, in the name of a local charity, of some ladies (not residents of the city) and of the lines upon which that canvass was being prosecuted. A libel suit ensued, nominally at the instance of one of the ladies referred to, and after repeated attempts at postponements by the plaintiff's lawyers, came to trial seven months later. After a comparatively brief trial, the presiding judge dismissed the action with costs, declared the statements in the article to be true, to be in the public interest, to be without malice, and to be within the legitimate province of the newspaper. In short he declared the newspaper to have performed a service to the public, and in so far as lay in his power he saddled the plaintiff with the costs.

It is in connection with these costs, however, that one of the abuses complained of develops. The action stood in the name of a party who left the city shortly after the action was entered, and who ever since has been in the

The solicitors' fees and expenses in this action which the Times is liable for, amount to $442.30. Security for costs to the amount only of $150 was given by the plaintiff, Mr. Justice Drake refusing an application to increase that sum. The Times is therefore in the position of having to pay the dif-ference between these two amounts, or $292.30, for the privilege of publishing facts in the public interest. The newspaper whose conduct has been vindicated by the court, as well as by public opinion, is thereby penalized as heavily as the plaintiff or her backers, who lost their suit. That phase of the question is simply a travesty of justice. We suppose when Mr. Justice Drake declined the application mentioned he believed that either Mrs. Wiles was a resident of British Columbia, in which case the plaintiff might have redress, or that $150 was sufficient to cover all costs to which the plaintiff would be put.

Through the operation of such a procedure, however, any adventurer or adventuress may for a trifling sum subject a public journal to annoyance for a lengthy period as long as lawyers exist who will lend their aid to such a course. In the present instance a determined attempt was made to have the trial postponed until July, 1904, exactly one year from the time the writ

Modern justice is perhaps as pure and undefiled as was the ancient variety, but like most other desirable modern things, it comes exceedingly high. In nine cases out of ten, a newspaper charged with libel, even where it is evident that the charge cannot be established, would be a financial gainer, by compromising and paying damages. But if newspapers do so, wherein would lie the protection of the public? In the old days the press was exposed to tyranny and to muzzling in its cruder and harsher forms; in later times this persecution has assumed more refined shape, but it is a ques tion for argument which could be most effectively employed to stifle criticism, were publishers, mindful only of their own pecuniary interests and were deficient in public spirit.

These abuses are matters to which the bench, and the reputable portion of the bar, should devote attention. Otherwise the profession will lose much in public estimation, and legal procedure will be in danger of more radical amendment than might be desirable.
