Enjoying a Blessing.
DEAR SIBS,—Last summer my younger sister was taken very badly with cramp, indeed we were almost in despair, having little hope of curing them. Finally we applied Haysard's Yellow Oil, and to our great joy it cured them perfectly, and they are now enjoying the blessing of perfect health.

SERIES XVI.
CHAPTER I.

A fortnight after Digby's interview with Mr. Bourchier, Milie, Francesa and her husband returned from America. The expedition had been a highly satisfactory one to all except Allan. The anomalous position in which a country gentleman, signing for the calm pleasures of married life, is placed as the husband of a prima donna, became painfully evident to him during his wife's triumphant tour through the States. The days spent on the return voyage were periods of unbroken delight, but to the remainder of the time he ever afterwards looked back with something like a shudder. He had found much to complain of in England, but in America matters were ten times worse. There private life seemed to have vanished entirely.

Milie, Francesa, was in the hands of very clever people, people who thoroughly understood the way to insure a transatlantic success. The peculiarity of the American appears to be, that although critical enough to refuse to accord mediocrity for genius, however much mediocrity may be puffed and praised, genius without these adventitious aids is apt to be overlooked or despised. This is a curious but well-known fact to all cultivators to our otherwise shrewd cousins across the water.

This process of puffing and praising, of going before and preparing the way, of stimulating the public curiosity by a hundred and one little personal paragraphs, narrating some adventure, extravagance, or eccentricity of the approaching star, is an art in itself—an art of which the masters are few and far between, and valued accordingly. Their services are eagerly sought after by those who have a new and great attraction to offer to the American public. The organizers of the present venture had secured the services of one who knew his business to a nicety. So that shortly after his arrival in America Allan might have gleaned enough from the various papers to compile several interesting biographies of his wife. Many of these paragraphs he was able to look at from the comical side and exchange pleasantries with Francesa as to her adventurous life; but these were others which contained all hints and veiled insinuations, which made his blood boil and set him longing for the sanctity and seclusion of private life.

The whole affair was most ably managed. It was not until she had sung and had fully justified the appearance of the laudatory paragraphs that the fact of Milie, Francesa being an American was officially announced. This stroke, now that success seemed assured, was never one. Enthusiasm rose to a high patriotic pitch. Even the singing born went to whip creation as far as music was concerned. One paper gravely announced that Francesa would disappoint the British, or next season, so she was received to remain in America in order to sing "The Star-spangled Banner" to a New York audience on the next 4th of July, an equally absurd statement were published in other papers.

And the interviewers! Allan began to dread the sight of men lest one of them should turn out to be an interviewer. The new discovery was at its height. The interviewers interviewed Francesa whenever they could and the organizers of the tour whenever they chose. Allan was not spared, shining as he did with the reflected light—so they interviewed Allan. It was not his declining the honor; in that case they said they had interviewed him, which answered every purpose.

As Milie, Francesa's husband, he was an object of great interest, and having spent a very commonplace, uneventful life, it was necessary for the sake of the public that the life he ought to have led should be substituted for the real one. It was but natural he should be depicted as the heir to an immense estate, a leader of fashion, a poet, an artist, a ruined gambler, a successful member of the ring who had won $50,000 over the last Derby; that he should have wooed and won Francesa in a most romantic way; that he should have killed a couple of rivals in duels, which were described with exquisite accuracy. Had Allan wanted an easy road to fame or notoriety he had most certainly found it by his marriage with Milie, Francesa.

He had sense enough to see he was powerless, but not sense enough to refrain from looking at or troubling himself about the paragraphs and accounts given by interviewers. He read them all, feeling that if he neglected to do so he must fancy they were more vexing and in worse taste. He read in the papers of every large city they were bound to an elaborate description of his wife, her dresses, her jewels, what she ate or drank, her mode of life from the hour she rose to the hour she went to rest. It stopped there, although one correspondent ventured to delight his readers with the description of the color, material, and pattern of Milie, Francesa's dressing-gown and combing-jacket.

And the travelling about, the whirl from one city to another, the theatres and concert-halls, the living in huge, overgrown hotels—he hated it all. Again and again his thoughts turned to Redhills. He pictured a clear, bright, frosty day; the rills, drive, or walk they would have together; the return to dinner; the pleasant evening spent together afterwards. Or he turned to London—saw himself in Parliament, working hard to make a name; saw his wife sharing his ambition, aiding him with her advice—a queen of society, perhaps but Mrs. Allan Bourchier, not Milie, Francesa. Would the good time come at last?

Yet, he would have undone nothing. He was, he told himself, amply repaid for all annoyances by the prize he had won; for as yet not a cloud had come between them. In the short intervals of quiet they could snatch they were as bride and bridegroom still.

The American venture, with its trumpet-tongues, puffings, flatterings, and successes, came to an end, and Allan felt his spirits rise as he bade a glad but ungrateful adieu to the shores which had welcomed his wife so heartily, made so much of her, and parted with her so reluctantly. He never visited Allan again in a like capacity.

They had settled, upon their arrival in England, to go to one to Redhills. No one was more entitled to a holiday than Francesa; Allan also deserved one. They were to stay at Redhills a week or two, then pay a visit to Mabel at Shortlands, and then a house must be taken in town, and Francesa must prepare for the London opera season.

Her friend, the manager, was delighted to ascertain that, so far as was known, the fear he expressed to Allan was not to be realized. Allan, on his side, was disappointed. He had counted on the maternal affection as likely to be a powerful agent in inducing his wife to abandon his career. So it is that one man's pleasure works another man's pain.

When Mr. Bourchier received the letter which, preceding them across the ocean, told him they were coming to Redhills, he was pleased. If happiness and joy in living had left him, his love for his children still remained; and he would at least be able to see his eldest son in the height of newly-found bliss. He had become quite reconciled to the marriage, only sharing Allan's hope that in time Francesa would tire of public life and settle down as the wife of a country gentleman. He believed she would do so, having formed, during the short time he had seen her, a very high, but only a fair estimate of her character. A man must be indeed evil to be able to discern no good in others; and bad as Mr. Bourchier had shown himself to be, he did not entirely bad—like George Manders, for instance. Yet, since the arrival of that letter, everything was changed. How could he meet this girl, at the same table with her, hear her speaking to him with the affection due to her husband's father, knowing that his crime had rendered her fatherless, and worse still, that the moment she and Digby Bourchier—or whatever the villain's true name might be—met every thing would be revealed? The only chance of delay or averting the catastrophe was by complying with his demands.

So the money was sent. Not two thousand pounds asked for, but fifteen hundred; and as he posted a banker's draft for that amount to his son-in-law, Mr. Bourchier felt that it was but a step to Corberus, and that, sooner or later, it would be a question between ruin and exposure.

Digby, who felt certain that his money would be forthcoming, returned home in the very best of spirits. He told Josephine nothing as to the failure or the success of his expedition, and she did not condescend to inquire; but the way he laughed to himself, and the general air of self-satisfaction he wore, made her long to hear news from home. She wrote, begging her mother to send tidings of her father's health.

Mrs. Bourchier replied, and from her letter Josephine was able to gather that there had been a most trying scene between her husband and her father. Mrs. Bourchier wrote that her husband had been completely prostrated by whatever had occurred at the interview, and thought Josephine not to allow Digby to visit Redhills any more. The poor girl smiled as she read this request. What voice had she in her husband's comings or goings?

A few days afterwards her husband broke open a letter, and showed her the order for the money. His exultant and triumphant manner as he did so was hateful to her.

"There," he said, "you see that I know how to get over papa. You couldn't have asked him the right way. He is very easy to manage, if you know how."

She was surprised and mortified. She felt the money had in some way been wrung from her father, and feared whether her letter had done anything to increase the force brought to bear upon him—whether he had been entreated for her sake.

"I don't understand," she said. "To me it seems shameful. I hope you did not disband it on my account?"

"Not in the least—entirely for myself. I shall ask for more some day. Papa will be too sensible, I hope, to refuse again."

Josephine by this time had grown to loathe her husband. It seemed to her that every day, every hour, revealed some new weakness of character, hinted at some new vice. From the end of the first year after their marriage until lately she had felt more contempt and indifference than anything else. Her idea had been that he was a pitiful schemer, who had married her for his own ends by a subterfuge. She had been deceived and wronged, but the mistake was here, and it was her place to pay the penalty. Her father had conveyed to her the idea that for some reason he wished her to continue to live with her husband as long as she could bear it—so she had always looked upon returning to Redhills as a last resource—one to which she must resort until matters grew beyond endurance.

Now that keen, honest hatred, not unmingled with terror, had taken possession of her, her thoughts again and again turned to flight. But if she fled from him how could she compel her to return—would he do so? She fancied that in some way she was useful to him to further the success of his schemes.
