How the World Looks to the Short-Sighted.

By CONSTANCE CLYDE.

INTERESTING descriptions have been written regarding the new world that opens to the blind when sight is given to them. Less in degree, of course, yet noteworthy too in its way, is the surprise of the short-sighted when, after years spent without glasses, he looks through spectacles that show him what the world really is. Very true was the exclamation of the myopic lad when thus privileged:

sight as an ailment which merely prevents due recognition of distant objects. It is not realized that much more is involved than this. Our limited range of vision gives us not only a circumscribed but also a different view of our surroundings. Thus, in admiring Nature, I, the myopic, behold a landscape other than that which spreads before you. Vegetation, for instance, is blurred and soft like an impressionist picture, the color spreading occasionally as if a child had handled the brush. You see spaces between the clearly-defined leaves of the tree and the light

How a short-sighted person out walking sees the passers-by.

"Mother, I have never seen you till now. It scarcely seems you!" This normal vision, possible only by artificial means, makes the world for a time abnormal to him because what Shakespeare terms his "bisson conspectuities" have long shown him one that is not merely circumscribed, but different.

The common opinion regards short-shining through the spaces. I see merely a soft mass with no spaces, the leaves all blotting into one another. The same holds good with other aspects of Nature—it is a world without detail or outline, this giving even solid buildings a cloudy and unsubstantial look.

Not only the inanimate, but the animate world presents itself in strange

As the world appears to a person of ordinary sight.
