Just Folks.

By EDGAR A. GUEST.

THE BOSS.

The other day while in a store a man in anger paced the floor. "Hey you!" he shouted in his rage. "Get busy there and earn your wage!" He snarled at people left and right. Scorned every term that is polite. And made the men and women cower. And all because he had the power. "Who is this man running wild?" I asked. "The Boss," she said and smiled.

I stood awhile and watched him then. In action with his fellow-men. He strode the aisles, too big to see the little girl standing near. Too big to nod his head and say "Good morning," in a kindly way. But loudly snapping orders out. As though authority must shout. Thinking a snarling speech and brief. The badge and sceptre of a chief.

No doubt they wonder why the clerk Sometimes neglects her daily work; No doubt they count the weekly sales. To find that some department fails. And he goes out and puts the blame On one he's never called by name—A timid girl who's never heard. From him, one kindly, cheerful word. When they should truly charge the loss. Unto the conduct of the boss.

Who seeks co-operation here Should rule by friendship, not by fear. When power is arrogantly used Destruction's dynamite is fused. Wise is the chief who bears with all His people's errors, great or small. With patience, for they soon shall learn. That he is just when he is stern. And every boss should keep in mind A man may rule and still be kind.

The Farmer Makes Egg Flip.

By an Old Maid.

Ask any old-fashioned farmer in Norfolk or Suffolk when he intends to start his Christmas jollifications, and you will almost certainly receive as answer, "Christmas Eve."

For these are the folk who still adhere to the old-time custom of making—and drinking—egg flip on the occasion.

It is invariably the farmer himself who makes the egg flip; as he is sure to invite some friends to share it, he makes a large satisfying quantity—something over a gallon.

From the cellar he fetches a pint of rum and a gallon of his most special ale. Besides them he places eight of the biggest and brownest eggs from his poultry yard, and just a little ground ginger and nutmeg. A bowl of sugar—from which he will use as much as he fancies—is also stood out in readiness.

Having surrounded himself with these things, the farmer begins operations over the kitchen fire. Huge jugs are placed in the oven, so that they may be as hot as possible when they are needed.

Next he begins to beat the ale; while this is being done the farmer will delicately, and with a wonderfully light hand, beat up his eggs.

Presently he adds the rum, and sugar, and ginger, and nutmeg; he goes on beating all the time, with one eye on the boiler over the fire.

Every time froth rises to the surface of the ale, the farmer deftly skims it off and adds to the mixture he is beating.

He continues this until the psychological moment—which happens to be the one before the ale reaches boiling point—arrives.

The beer is then lifted from the fire and poured into the bowl of beaten eggs and spice.

The hot jugs are hastily removed from the oven, and the egg flip poured backwards and forwards from one to the other. This is done several times to ensure the blending of all the ingredients.

TORTURE.

I have out out all my laughing. I'm a stranger to delight, for my neighbor's photograph, grinding music, day and night, and my bitter cup I'm quaffing, and my language is a fright. Once my life was gay and cheerful, it held nothing sad or sour, and my map was never fearful, never knew a briny shower; 'twas before I got an ear full of tinny music every hour. I am fond of music stately, be it cantered or be it raw; I enjoy the masters' greatly, singing songs without a flaw. But the next I'm hearing lately sounds like filling of a saw. For my neighbor's graphophone, and his records all are punk; they are rattling, shrieking, growling, with a clinking, clanking clunk; and I'm yearning and I'm howling for a hermit's cave and bunk. Oh, my jazzy neighbor's grinding evermore a tinny tune; he is winding, winding, winding, in the torpid hour of noon; noisy solace he is finding by the pale light of the moon. And he leaves his couch to thither with his Jimmie music mill; when the eastern skies grow pinker he is wrestling with it still, and he hands me, line and sinker, music guaranteed to kill. So my heart is slowly breaking, and I shed a price.
