QUO VADIS?

A winter evening, an open hearth, a few friends watching in a pensive silence the glow of the dying fire. And then: "Quo vadis?" Wether are we going?" Someone asked the age old question.

"And why," added someone else, falling into the mood, "if there is another life somewhere after this one, are we so afraid of death? It's the humblest and commonest of all our anguishes, this clinging to life, this horror and fear of death that everyone has."

"Not everyone," said the Lady Who Always Knows Somehow. "Did you ever stop to think that the only ones who aren't afraid of death are those who are about to die?"

I love to think so. When you read of the departure of some great ocean liner with its hundreds of happy voyagers, the half gay, half sad farewells, the flowers and gifts, the anticipation, and all the bustle and excitement of those last moments just before the great ship slips away from the shore doesn't it make you want to go journeying, too?

There is another departure I have read of, a last farewell that helps me to think trustfully of the day when I, too, shall journey toward "that domain from which no traveller returns." It is the story told by Arthur Benson, the English essayist, of the death of his brother Hugh, the priest. Hugh's was a life lived a-tiptoe. Always alert, always doing something, writing, weaving tapestries, painting, preaching, travelling.

He Passed Eagerly Around the Corner. Finding life all too short for all that he wanted to do, how did Hugh meet death? He had been ill but a short time and his brother had been summoned, not so much with the fear of his not recovering as to be with him in his sickness. And then in the middle of the night came the dread call, and Arthur hurrying to his brother's room, tells us that he found him propped against his pillows, his eyes shining with the awe and wondering knowledge of what was about to be.

"Arthur," he said, "this is the end," and in his voice was all the eagerness of one about to embark upon a new and marvellous adventure. A few moments later, with a quick word of farewell and an unflinching, commanding of his soul to its Maker, Hugh was gone, and his brother says: "It was impossible to think of him as dead. It was as if he had passed around a corner, but that unquestionably, just out of sight, he was there alive and eager, hurrying on."

There's a going I love to think of. "And may there be no sadness of farewell when I embark." "He Giveth His Beloved Sleep." And to those for whom the lure of adventure has waned, and who are longing rather for rest, the prayer for the road's end and by Theodosia Garrison holds out a promise of peace which is beautifully told:

At the road's end when shadows dim, to draw me gently through his gates, And lead me, like some kindly host, who gives a long expected guest the comfort that he craves the most, the hospitality of rest."

GOOD WORK.

Pete Fringle tolled for many years; he made silk purses of sows' ears, and seldom took a rest; his purses were in great demand, and it was said through out the land, these purses were the best, and people sometimes said to Pete, "You have a plant that can't be beat—why not make other things? The wooden tumblers of graft is fine, and you could turn out hams of pine, and pewter wedding rings." "I don't believe," old Pete replied, "in spreading out a graft so wide; no scheme like that endures."

Let Him Lie

Editor Evening Telegram

Dear Sir.—In spite of the denial published in the "News," I still believe that, piece in the "Advocate" was written, if not in Placentia town, somewhere in the district. I have reasons for thinking the author is a government pensioner, who is always ready to apply for any jobs that may have a remote chance of becoming vacant, and puts in his spare time biting the hand that feeds him. Now, sir, if he is qualified for a job, he is not eligible for a pension. He also promises some more of his "stuff" on other small officials, whose jobs he may be hankering after. Before his programme is filled we may be able to divert his attention, from a campaign of scurrility to one of self-defence. Mister Man, did you ever hear the one about "Sleeping Dogs"? Better let the pup finish his nap.

Yours truly,

"TOWSER."

Women a Bundle of Nerves

"Everything irritates me—I am a bundle of nerves, I ache all over and cannot sleep and am so despondent." This extract from a letter written from one woman to another describes the condition of many women who suffer from feminine ailments. Nothing will relieve this distressing condition so surely as Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs. For fifty years it has been restoring sick and ailing women of America to health and strength.

St. John's Man One of Many Students

FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD WHO RECEIVED DEGREES FROM NEW YORK UNIVERSITY.

NEW YORK, June 18.—Robert Saunders, of 23 Franklin Avenue, St. John's, Newfoundland, received the degree of Master of Science in Commerce at the ninety-second annual commencement exercises of New York University which were held Wednesday morning, June 11, on the terraced campus of the University just west of the Hall of Fame.

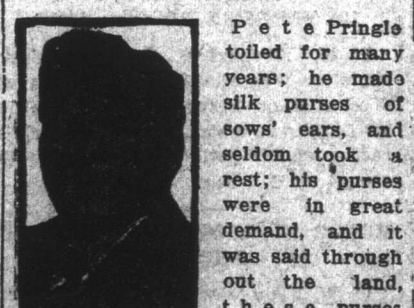

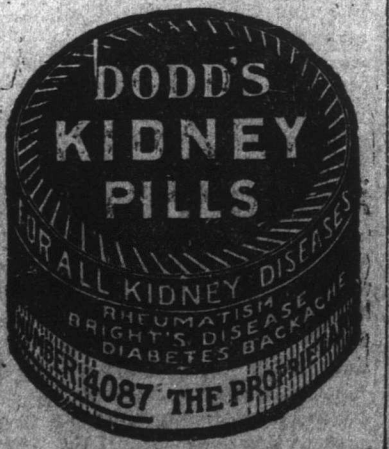

The Deans of the eleven schools and colleges of the university, together presented 1,300 candidates to the conferring of degrees in their several schools. These students represented ten different foreign countries, two territories and thirty-two states, including all the races but the Indian, and practically all of the known religious sects of the world. Professor Jeremiah Whipple Jenks, research professor of government and public administration at the university and who is an international authority on the business and political situation both at home and abroad, delivered the commencement address, speaking on "America's Role in Europe." Dr. Jenks was in Europe while the Dawes Committee was at work and was able to observe at first hand the impressions made in the different countries of Europe by the committee's work and judge of its probable effect.

Seedless raisins give additional interest to rhubarb marmalade. When apricots are used in desserts flavor with a little lemon. Sliced hard-boiled eggs are good served in thick, hot white sauce. A pinch of sugar improves young carrots and peas cooked together.
