glamour of the Orient caught by those responsible for the decorative scheme The magnificent throne, shrouded in a delicately tinted light, which threw into relief the lifelike representation of Buddha; the clear, limpid waters of the lake; the marble roofs of the mosques and minarets in the distance; the intriguing odour of burning incense; above all, the multi-coloured costumes of the Strollers and their guests, combined to form an unforgetable scene that was as beautiful as it was magnificent. All who attended entered into the spirit of the thing and every care seemed to have been taken to give their costumes the appearance of exactitude and the touch of colour, which would cause them to blend best with the decorations and so achieve a "tout ensemble," which dancers, in both cases, are deserving of the very highest praise, nor could ladies of the East, trained from infancy to dance, have shown themselves more creditable performers. During the evening, a rascally bandit descended, with great uproar, upon the Court and, in a loud voice, backed by a dangerous look and a wicked knife, called upon all, on peril of their lives, to "vote for Julia." He was immediately seized by the guard and hauled before the Sultan, by whose orders he was instantly executed. As his neck was placed on the block, he was heard to mutter, "Aw. go hon." A second fater there was a dull thud and a staring head was shown to the interested and terror-stricken spectators. Just before supper, Miss Elsie Herder rendered, "Less than the Dust," and "Pale Hands," two of the Indian Love Lyrics. She was in splendid voice and captivated her audience. The supper arrangements, under the direction of the Chief Chef of the Court, were carried out without a

Shortly after supper the dancers were rudely interrupted by terrific growls and a terrified native rushed into the courtyard, howling "Tiger, the tiger is coming." A space was soon cleared as the tiger, which had changed its stripes and become a leepard, ambled play-fully into the courtyard, Cunningly, it had timed its visit for just after its intended victims had eaten. Round the room it sprang, its grotesque shape striking terror into all beholders. But not for long! From out the crowd sprang Lord Percy de Vere Montmor-ency, the noted beer hunter. Armed with a pop gun and a monocle, he advanced courageously, and while Mr. Hiram K. Perkins, of Emporia, Maine, held the leopard's tail, Lord Percy pushed the feroclous beast over, where it lay still and was eventually carried away by the guard. The dance Winnipeg Nov.
