To try to reproduce the Address de livered by Dr. Rendall would be atempting the impossible, as to take the spoken matter out of the atmosphere which he created and which held the audience in its snell would altogether rob the lecture of its merit. It will be readily understood that a man who had spent 37 years as a Master and 14 years as Headmaster of Winchester College was steeped in its traditions and familiar with every detail of its notable history and the life led within its precincts. It was with such matters that the lecturer dealt, and so successfully, that his every word left its

The Public Schools of England were dedicated to the service of the State, and were content to slave and give themselves freely in its cause. Presentation to Winchester might well be regarded as the mother of the public schools as from it the system originated. Situated in the ancient capital of England, the College had the advantage of an environment which was ideal. There was England's great Cathedral, dating back to 1079; there rested the bones of 25 Kings; and everything spoke of the notable characters and the great events which went to make

The lecture was illustrated by lantern slides, and as the various pictures were thrown on the screen Dr. Rendall described what he termed the ly exhausted. Yesterday at the East Seven Lamps of Education. The first views were those of Winchester Cathedral, typifying the first Lamp, Worship, and this was further illustrated by views of the College Chapel, Confirmation day, and the visit made to the top of St. Catherine's Hill twice a year when service was held by the students in the early morning. Reverence, the second Lamp, was represented by the massive buildings, the attitude of the scholars as they gathered for certain ceremonies or passed sacred objects within the precincts of the College.
