A Regard For Appearances

An old proverb runs, "You can't judge a horse by the harness." The language of practically every race contains a saying to the same effect. Nevertheless, whether people should be influenced by appearances or not, most are, at least, somewhat. The horse, well groomed, with good harness, brings a better sum than the same horse otherwise. No seller through the Want Ads sells most efficiently unless he heeds the importance of appearances Appearances are going to help him or hinder him. And he should see that they do not hinder him.

A typewriter, in running order, cleaned and oiled, will bring a better price, naturally, than the same machine in dusty, ill-kept condition, sans ribbon.

A washing machine, set up where used in the basement or shed, will sell better than the same machine with the cobwebs of the attic on it. A matron in clean housedress will get a better price for the phonograph than the lady who has been too busy to escape from boudoir cap and soiled apron. Not that some of these unfavorable circumstances make any difference necessarily in the intrinsic value of what one has to sell. People, though, are influenced by appearances. A house, shown by the owner, white-collar style, looks more attractive than the same house shown overalls style. The clean dog in a neat kennel looks a better dog than the same animal summoned up from the tin cans of a back alley.
