scenes, and for the dining-room the English hunting scenes.

For the single chambers of a cottage there is a call for a paper with a fine, almost indistinguishable figure. The armure printed in two tones of one color, meets most closely this special need, or, for a substitute, a small geometrical design made for ceilings. The picturesque outlines of the sharp-pointed roofs of a cottage offer a distracting problem when the treatment of the inside walls is attempted. The difficulties of frieze, molding and dado can all be obliterated by selecting a small pattern without perpendicular lines and hanging it over sidewalls and ceiling. A rose climbing over a trellis, or flower powdered thickly, are charming used in this manner.

For every artistic or utilitarian need of the cottage walls there is a superabundance of happy ideas, varied colors, clever designs, that will contribute more than any other feature to the interior delights of the summer home.—Scientific American.

The end of life is not money; but duty; the law of life is not competition, but co-operation; the bond of life is not self-interest, but brotherhood.—Rainsford.
