THE KENNEBECASIS THE KENNEBECASIS
The Indians appear always to have had an appropriate meaning for the man appropriate meaning for the names they gave localities; natural objects, etc. In this they differed from the white people who, in many or most cases, named places, villages or towns in a most absurdly inappropriate manner. A northerly boundary of the Saint John of today is the Kennebecasis hiver. In Indian the terminative with with the suggestion 'Hills and Angry Waters' as the meaning, it was thought that the riddle had been solved. To anyone viewing the hilly peninsula and the breaking of Fundy's surf over the reefs and the swirl of the harbor or river currents around the covers, that appropriateness of the name would be apparent. The opinion, however, that appropriateness of the hame would be apparent. The opinion, however, that the name alludes to some animal, fish or bird abundant in or frequenting the locality, or to some festival or custom of the Indians, is not abandoned.

VARIED SUGGESTIONS.

"An old map showing the place has it "Men-ak-wes," and also 'Mena-gouche,' the first no doubt English, the latter a French mode of spelling the name. A good authority (Ganong) states the meaning is uncertain. Another (Rand) believes the meaning to other (Rand) believes the meaning to be 'where dead seals are collected.' Some later research gives the opinion word or sentence means place of his pillow, or where head

OLD CITY WELLS To recall the locations of some of principal public wells supplying water to the city in old times may be interesting. There were, of course, room Suites. yard, across the road and a little northwest of the Court House; one north side of the square near the corner of Sydney, opposite Park Hotel and another near the southwest corner of the square; a well between Sydney street line; one near the corner of Duke and Sydney and one of he most notable on Union street, east of Jones' brewery. Water was sold from these wells, in some cases, the owners carting the water in hogsheads and selling by the pail.

"Much of local interest, romance and story could be related about the old wells. There was a celebrated well near Fort Howe; another fine one near the corner of Millidge avenue and Rockland road. The completion of the extensive water system of the city disposes of nearly all of these wells-as
