MAJOR PLAYED CARDS WITH GUNNERS; COURT MARTIAL THE RESULT!

But He is Acquitted of Scandalous Behavior at Woolwich.

A charge of scandalous conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, brought against Major H. Brent Clark, of the Royal Garrison Artillery, well known in the army as the "human machine," collapsed at a Woolwich court martial last week, says a London cable. There was a further charge of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

Major Clark was found not guilty of the first charge, the court's decision on the second will be promulgated in due course. It was said that Major Clark, who held strong views on what he called "the human machine," had invited gunners to his quarters, had played cards with them, invited them to drink, and had allowed them to sit with their tunics off and their shirt collars undone.

Evidence as to Major Clark's irreproachable character was given. Mr. Reeves, addressing the court for defence, said: "The psychology of the man is important. If the court did not know the views held by Major Clark the evidence brought before them might leave suspicious in the minds of the people who heard it, but when the psychology of the man is appreciated it explains away any suggestion that the things mentioned in the charges can be connected in any way with anything that may be called scandalous.

The judge advocate, in his summing up, said the evidence for the prosecution, put at its highest, would not warrant the court in convicting Major Clark of behaving in a scandalous manner.
