

Trinity College School, Port Hope.

Extract from the Port Hope Times.

"The building, now finished in Elizabethan style, has four storeys, is built of brick—strong and massive, and will form, when the projected buildings are all erected, the east wing of the School. The main entrance, on the south side, reached by a broad flight of steps, leads through double doors into a wide lofty hall, lit by a fine gothic window, from which two staircases, one for masters and pupils, the other for servants, communicate with the upper storeys, where similar halls traverse the building from south to north, while each flat is again crossed from east to west by a passage eight feet wide.

"The ground floor contains, besides the reception, head-master's, and matron's rooms—all models of neatness and comfort—the studies of the pupils, one for the higher and lower classes, and one for the prefects, (elder scholars who, by diligence and good behaviour, have won the confidence of the head master,) and also the temporary dining-rooms. All these rooms have a charming view either of the fertile country and the lake beyond, or to the north, of the green hills and well cultivated fields and orchards, dotted with country houses and farm buildings. The walls of the studies wainscoted from floor to ceiling, look warm and com-
