Drayman McMillan, while carring refuse from the rear of Mayor Patteson's, overloaded his wagon and it started backwards down the bank, falling into the river. The horses were easily extricated. A chain was then hitched to the wagon and it was pulled out. The occurrence caused a good deal of excitement along the west and of King street. Stories were circulated to the effect that the man and his horses had fallen into the river and been drowned.

A correspondent writes: "Such machines should not be left out in an open yard without being locked; for hoys are always up to some thing, and it is a mercy the accident, bad as it is, was no worse, the machine would have taken the whole hand off as easily as the end of the thumb.
