Successful Restoration to Health of Well Known Canadian who Cases were Given up as incurable.

From the few of the hundreds of letters we have received from those who have been restored to health and strength by the use of that wonderful discovery, Paint's Colby Compound, we make a few extracts. We hope that the thousands of Canadian men and women who are suffering from nervous and wasting diseases, will profit by these true and plain statements of facts.

D. S. Davison, of Montreal, suffered for years with nervous dyspepsia, pain in his back, and rheumatism. He tried drugs without relief. He tried fish soup, and had also given up hope when he commenced the use of Paint's Colby Compound. "Now," he says, "I am a new man. I sleep well and my food does not hurt me."

Mr. Joe Johnson, 20 St. Charles Street, Montreal, suffered for years with nervous dyspepsia, pain and aches, had no appetite, and could not sleep at night. His nerves were soothed and strengthened by Paint's Colby Compound, and he soon became well and strong.

Annie Goulet, of River Belcourt, B.C., found the Compound a certain cure for weakness, and now feels as well as she did.

A customer of Haines Bros., druggists, Hamilton, Ont., told them that he was entirely cured of nervous weakness by the use of two bottles of the Compound, after everything else has failed.

The little child of Mr. G. E. Morefield, 26 D'Arcy St., Toronto, was cured of St. Vitus' Dance by Paint's Colby Compound.

The Blockade Runner:

On JAMES'S TRAVELS

CHAPTER X.

John Davison left him for the second time. John Scott rose from his chair, and taking a decanter containing brandy from a cupboard, poured a large glassful and said, "There you go into his chair with a sigh of relief.

"By Jove," he exclaimed, "that was a narrow escape. Had Edward Scott been here, I would have been cut, but David is to be seen, and well he may. But David is to be seen, and well he may. The thousand pounds is a big sum for him to earn, and he's got it easily. But still my position is not secure. As far as I am concerned, the money is not in my hands. I am in danger. I must try to get hold of it, and to guard against accidents I must marry the girl. Hang it! I wanted a wife anyway, and she'll do as well as any other.

John Scott was not the man to give off colour, especially in a matter of such vital importance. That very day he wrote to his wife in Greenwich, announcing that he would pay her a visit and perhaps stay over the New Year holidays. Two days afterwards he went to Greenwich. On arrival he made straight for Davison's residence in Castor Street, and found the lawyer in his private room.

"Ah, Mr. Scott, my dear sir," cried Davison, starting up and shaking his hand, "you are most welcome. Please, may I ask, is there an unexpected pleasure? Pay me quickly."

Scott carefully closed the door and took a seat opposite the lawyer. They exchanged a few words, looking each other in the eye, and then, perhaps, which was the greater or equal of the two.

"I've come down to Greenwich to spend a little holiday," said the lawyer.

"Quite so," returned the lawyer in pretty much the same tone as one uses when expressing surprise at some wonderful piece of information communicated on the face of a April.

"Yes, I—have an aunt in Greenwich. Very worthy person—promised to visit her for a long time and never done it."

"We are all apt to neglect these elderly relatives," murmured the lawyer, "more especially when fate has sent them a number of hairs, or has failed to send them a fair portion of this world's goods." Such is the tendency our weak human nature."

Scott looked earnestly at the speaker, suspecting that Davison was making a play upon him. "The reason is that the girl you care much too much about a person to be deceived, he determined to throw all hypocrisy aside."

"I've come to Greenwich for two things," Davison said. "In the first place I want to see whether anything can be done with regard to the marriage certificate, and, in the second, I wish to make the acquaintance of your Greenwich belle—my cousin Maggie Gray I think you said she was called."

"You shall have my fee thousand pounds," he said.

"Ten shall have my fee in a fortnight," answered the merchant promptly.

"Good. Then you are ready to meet me at the station?"

"Yes. As long as that is not in our hands the position is innocent."

"True; but if you marry Maggie Gray!"

"Even, even if I do I shall like to have that paper in my possession."

"Hush," mused the lawyer, "it would certainly be desirable to have it."

"Don't you think of a plan?" asked Scott.

"Well, you see, we don't even know if the document is in existence. If it is, then it is no doubt to be in your cousin's hands in Greenwich."

Scott folded his arms and looked up at the ceiling.

"Charleston is, or will shortly be, in a very bad state of health. All sorts of trouble are likely to befall him. Let us take advantage of that state of matters in some way!"

The lawyer rose and went to the window.

"There's a man away past just now," he said, "a person with whom I—ah—I have had—transactions. Brown, they call him. Joseph Brown. I have a right to expect to be rid of a couple of thousand dollars by getting out of one of the blockade runners. Shall I send a clerk after him?"

"Mr. Brown, a person who can be trusted and who is a merchant, naturally."

"You shall pay him well enough."

"Then send for him."

Davison rang the bell, and requested Webster, who answered his summons, to come up and the street and bring back Joseph Brown.

In a few minutes Joseph made his appearance. As he was now a moneyed man and a capitalist, he entered with a swagger, nodded complacently to the lawyer, and seated himself on one chair and his new hat on another. Brown had spent a portion of his five hundred pounds in the purchase of a new suit and in getting his hair and beard trimmed. He had instructed the barber not to cut his hair too short, because it reminded him of his—well, of a dead brother, who used to wear it long.

"Ah, Brown," cried the lawyer, casting a nervous look at his companion, "I thought you had been away to Charlton. Where do you stay now?"

"Well, Mr. Davison," said the lawyer, "particularly recently. Depends on circumstances." The fact was that since Brown gave his five hundred pounds had somewhat changed his mind as to blockade running, and was now engaged in a number of ventures in Greenwich. Blockade running meant work and trouble, with perhaps a prison cell as the result of it.

"Dear me, Brown," said the lawyer, "what a surprise that is!"

"Circumstances alter cases," replied Brown, quoting the copy books, and returning the lawyer's look with interest.

"Brown, J. J. Scott, of Guelph, Ontario."

In the extremity of his surprise Joseph started and nearly fell from his chair.

"Frank Dowler," he said, "I hardly knew you."

"I'm sorry to say that I have not seen you for some time."

"I have not seen all the fine prints whenever orders come in. The largest sheet of art of any size can be done."
