Plugged into the Mississauga Library

In 1970, Canada made scientific history. It sent the ship Hudson sailing from Halifax down to the Antarctic, up the Pacific to Vancouver, then into the Arctic and through the Northwest Passage. It was the first vessel ever to circumnavigate the two Americas.

The vessel carried 20 scientists — and author Alan Edmonds, who will talk about the resulting book, Voyage to the Edge of the World, at Central Library, tonight, Wednesday, May 16, at 7.30 p.m.

The Hudson's voyage cost the taxpayers $1,500,000, of which Edmonds got $12,000. In addition to the scientists and the author, the ship also carried a cargo of computers, magnetometers, and sampling bottles.

Edmonds describes how the scientists aboard started the day by tossing out a stick of dynamite (in the interests of science), how they took core samples from the sea bottom, dredging up a million years of natural history; how they handled phyto-plankton and pteropods.

And the human element? Edmonds tells how the crew reacted to the two women scientists aboard; and how they house-trained (if that's the right word aboard ship) the captain's puppy.

When the Hudson returned, voyage and mission complete, Governor-General Roland Michener told the crew: "You have not only added to our store of useful scientific knowledge, but to the stature of our Canadianism."

What he meant was: The U.S. ship Manhattan has toured the Arctic — but now Canada has shown the flag, too.

Another author visiting the Library, is John Eisenberg, author of Don't Teach That, a commentary on the risks teachers run when they discuss sex, politics or religion in schools.

The book details the case of a teacher in Saskatchewan who was fired for showing copies of an underground newspaper to her class; a teacher who was dismissed for criticizing the government's use of the War Measures Act during the Quebec crisis; and other controversial issues.

Eisenberg, who is a professor at Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, said last week that though his book was written to stimulate classroom discussion of these issues, it was not included in the Ministry of Education's approved list, and therefore is not much used.

"The reasoning is that teachers are not equipped to teach about these matters," he said. "But in medicine, if a new drug were produced that would cure certain things, doctors would have to learn how to administer it. This approach is not taken in education."

He blamed teachers. "The most disappointing thing about the cases described in my book is that teachers themselves don't support others in trouble."

Children lead double lives, he declared. "With other kids, they talk about drugs, the police, sex, anything. But school is always treated with cynicism; children play games with their teachers — they give the answers they think their teachers want."

Neil Davis, second vice-president of Ontario Men Teachers' Federation, presided.

Another aspect of teaching is dealt with in The Broken Bridge, a movie to be shown at Burnhamthorpe Library Thursday, May 17, at 10.30 a.m.

Irene Kassoria is an American therapist who has worked in Britain for two years with mentally ill children. The movie shows how, under her care, youngsters began to react, to produce words, and then sentences.
