A Tin Pyrometer.

A fin Pyrometer.

A tin pyrometer is now used for measuring temperatures above the thermocouple range with the use of a direct insertion pyrometer. According to the Electrical World, the tin is contained i na graphite bulb and expands through a graphite capillary tube. In this way the metal is subject to a reducing atmosphere, which is to a reducing atmosphere, which ject to a reducing atmosphere, whiteheas to maintain a bright surfa and keep the metal pure and from dross. The expansion of the state and keep the metal pure and lies from dross. The expansion of the graphite is almost negligible in comparison with that of the tin. The tin does not appreciately evaporate until a temperature of presumably 2,000 deg. C., is reached, so that no difficulty in change of calibration is encountered. A steel tube containing an insulated contact is lowered down to the capillary tube until it makes a contact with the surface of the tin and thus completes a circuit through an electric buzzer or sounder. The height of the tin is indicated by the position of the upper end of the steel tube which holds a pointer that moves beside a scale. Since the contact is insulated in quartz, which has an inappreciable thermal expansion, the inaccuracy is negligible.

BUSY ANIMALS.

The hens are laying luscious fruit, and cackle in their pride; they seem to know that from the Teut they'll help to take the hide. My Dorking hens, in other days, were rather stern and dour; but now whene'er a chicken lays she cackles by the hour. My old red cow's as fine as silk, she knows our needs, I think; the way she's turning out the milk silk, she knows our needs, I think; the way she's turnin; out the milk would drive a man to drink. She would drive a man to drink. She stancs around and thews her cud, stancs around and thews her cud, sedulous efforts of the British to until the milking is done, and seems to say, "This forming thod will help to can the Hun." It may be I ima-gine it, but Dobbin seems to know; gine it, but Dobbin seems to know; he pulls up harder on the bit, he's always keen to go. I hitch him to my one-hoss plow, and as he does his trick, methinks he says, "I'm striving now to queer the Prussian hick." This Dobbin horse was wont to balk before we drew the sword, and I would pelt him with a rock and lam him with a board. It may be I impose things but let us how? be I imagine things, but let us hope I'm right; we'll surely spoil the kraut-fed kings, if all the

The Echo From Rheims. The bombardment of the Cathedral of Rheims consolidated Mohammedans in India against Germany medans in India against Germany. This interesting statement is made by Bishop Warne of the American Methodist Church who has lived in India as a missionary for many years. He declares that in Lucknow the news of the first attack upon the cathedral was followed by the formation of an Indian National Mohammedan League. The leaders of this avoid hurting the sensibilities of Mohammedans. A special and shin-ing instance of the British way was cited by Bishop Warne in an interview quoted by the Literary Digest city authorities, rather than commit such a sacrilege, were preparing to construct a subway under the prayer platform. The Viceroy took the position that the street should be diverted slightly. Thus the expense of a subway was avoided, and the prayer platform was undisturbed.

Since the capture of Jerusalem additional evidence has been offered to the Mohammedan world of the contrast between British and German methods. In the days of peace Wilhelm of Germany visited Palestine. A portion of the wall of Jerusalem was pulled down so that he could have the satisfaction of riding into the city. In war-time, Gen, Allenby left his horses outside the walls and entered the city on foot. If, as Bishop Warne testifies, the reverberations of the guns trained upon Rheims reached the bazaars of Lucknow, how much more, the story of the British advance on Jerusalem?
