with a music mistress?"
Even while she spoke, Mrs. Montpellier's axiom rang once again in his ears—"You couldn't well marry a music mistress." If ever Gilbert resolved in his own mind that he would, it was at that that old Lady Fantail was a bit of a Tartar. No doubt Mrs. Pouter is a kind mistress, an excellent mother; she often washes that spoiled little boy, and puts him to bed herself. A delightful member of society, and a most attractive person. I know more than one of my acquaintances who would esteem Pouter's place cheaply purchased at half his worldly all. And yet, you see, Tom can't bring himself to agree with these admirers. What a host of suitors Penelope had! Would any one of them have stayed away so long as did crafty Ulysses, without even the excuse of being detained by the sirens? Who knows?

The sea breeze, a chat with a mutual acquaintance, and a happy remark of Tom's, depreciating the attractions of a pretentious lady, will restore good-humor and the Pouters will return to dinner in harmony and resignation. Alas! that which should be the acme of human felicity is but a matter to make the best of!—and much I doubt that even now which should be the acme of human felicity is but a matter to make the best of!—and much I doubt that even now both of them wish they hadn't. Is it wiser to be a dry branch altogether? Is it better to think of the blue eyes smiling in heaven, all unaltered still, than to have watched them till they learned to flash with anger here, or, yet worse, freeze into cold indifference and scorn? Woe is me! I think I would have fain run my chance with the others. Might not mine have been the favored lot—the

you should change your mind at any moment, remember you are perfectly free."

"And you?" he said, quickly, looking rather alarmed.

"I am different," she replied. "It is not likely that I should alter. Gilbert." she added, stopping short in her walk, and turning rather pale, "I—I will never belong to anybody but you. Enough of this. Tell me when you will go. Let us talk of your plans for the future. After all, a year is not such a very long time." work to have to bid him leave her, and to find him comply so generously, so this was more than she had expected, even from him. Ada felt indeed that a succession of such victories would lead to a final defeat. She must wish him adieu once for all. She had something more to say; she had neglected it too often. "You will make me one more promise."

all, a year is not such a very long time."

Perhaps her courage failed her a little now that it was settled. Perhaps, having persuaded him, she was now a little scared at her success. What if he should change? What if this wonderful dream should turn out to be but a dream, after all? Well, it was something to have dreamt it; and if he was happy she would never repine. With all their faults, and they had a good many, of which not the least is a tendency to rush constantly into extremes, they are not selfish, these women. And they bear a bankruptcy of the feelings, an utter fallure of all the hopes of a lifetime, better than do their sterner taskmasters. It may be that, as the subject more constantly occupies their minds, they more studiously prepare themselves for that catastrophe the subject more constantly occupies their minds, they more studiously prepare themselves for that catastrophe which seems to be the normal result of all spes animi credula mutui. Lonesome Honeymoon.

New York, Aug. 1.-There is some New York, Aug. 1.—There is some mystery in a wedding performed in Hoboken on Monday by Justice of the Peace Pfundheller. The bridegroom, John Zemann, is said to be a wealthy western business man. The bride, who gave her name as Theresa Feuerbauer, arrived in Hoboken on one of the big German liners two days before the wedding. She sailed yester-day on the Hamburg-American liner Bleucher. Zemann told the justice that he had known the bride as a girl and that she had come to this country in response to a proposal he had made to her by mail. He refused to discuss the young woman's return yesterday or to give any explanation for the short duration of the honey-

She laid her hand upon his arm. That gentie touch could calm Gilbert in his wildest mood, and he was ashamed of his ungenerous speech the moment it crossed his lips.

"Hush!" she said, with a quivering lip; "never say that again. Do not be unreasonable—do not be angry with me. I would give my life to serve you, and well-come. I ask you for my sake to do what I wish. It is not such a very long time." "Not a long time?" he pleaded; and it must have been no easy task to resist his entreaties. "A whole year, and you call it not a long time! Why, that fortnight nearly drove me mad; and now I am to go to the end of the earth, and never see you, or even hear from you, for twelve long months. You expect too much. Ada. I can't do it. After all, I have my feelings, like other people."

"Do you think I have not considered them all through?" was her reply; "do you think I have not watched and studied you till I know your would never here all through?" Thin-skinned, impatient, injudiclous, but as true as steel" (a smile chased away the listencer's frown). "Supposing we were—were married tomorrow, however much you might regret it, I know you would never let me find it out. It is precisely for that reason I urge this step for my own sake. Gilbert, dear Gilbert, think what my feelings would be if I were not persuaded, convinced in my own mind, that you had chosen me deliberately, advisedly, and on mature reflection. Would you like Lady Olivia to be able to reproach me that I had hurried her son into a mesalliance with a music mistress?"

own mind that he would, it was at that moment.

"If that is all," he burst out, "I won't hear of it for an instant. Am I not a free agent? Who is there to dictate to me? Can I not choose whom I please?"

"Then we must put it the other way," she said, smiling playfully in his face.
"You must do something to deserve me, sir. Like a knight of the olden time, you shall not win your lady without an achievement. It sounds a vain speech, and yet I don't think you will be angry with me; but seriously, Gilbert, such an affection as I have to give—well, as I have given—is worth a sacrifice."

She certainly did not think he looked angry, and it seemed to Ada that no

She certainly did not think he looked angry, and it seemed to Ada that no music she had ever made or heard sounded in her ears so sweetly as the voice in which he spoke.

"Do you really love me so much, Ada?" "I mustn't spoil you," she answered, laughing off her emotion. "I must leave all that for the future. In the meantime, I will tell you what you shall do. Promise me that for a whole year you wil travel, exert yourself, improve your mind, and fit yourself for the high station in store for you. I know you have great talents. I should be sorry to see them thrown away in a life of idleness. I should like to see my—I mean one in whom I am interested—take a high place among men. I should like to see him envied, admired, looked up to. I could be very ambitious on his account, and so proud of him when he succeeded."

"What, Gilbert!" she said, coldly enough, extending him two fingers to shake, "I certainly did not expect you. I thought you had gone out of town. I have not seen you for three weeks."

He felt the represent was not undergone. He felt the reproach was not undeserv-

"Mother," he answered, "I am afraid I have been very negligent. I came here on purpose to tell you so; to ask your forgiveness for much that may have offended you. I am sorry to have been wanting in my duty toward you. Make friends with me before I go."
Lady Olivia could not but be gratified at so submissive an avowal, be softened by this unlooked-for humility. She could not enjoy her triumph, however, without displaying it. This was too good an opportunity to be missed of reading her prodigal son a lecture. So she sat down in her own especial armchair and began in her haughtiest tones:

"I have never complained of your conduct toward me, Gilbert, nor have I expected anything else from you now, for a good many years. I am glad to find that you have been at last brought to see the error of your ways. Better late than payer. "Mother," he answered, "I am afraid many a glowing vision, half-hinted, half-expressed. What can be more dull in detail than the conversation of such a couple?—what more absorbing to the colloquists? There are many pastimes at which it is very poor fun to be a lookeron, and theirs was indeed of engrossing interest to the players themselves. They settled it at last in this wise: Gilbert was to absent himself from England for a year, or, at least, for so much of a year as Ada considered a sufficient probation. He was to go to Australia; he was to occupy himself in every possible manner which could wean him from his one cherished idea. Above all, and on this point she was very firm—so much so as almost to anger him again—they were not to correspond. Also, the subject was to remain a profound secret from his family and from his friends. John Gordon, or any very intimate associate, he might take into his confidence.

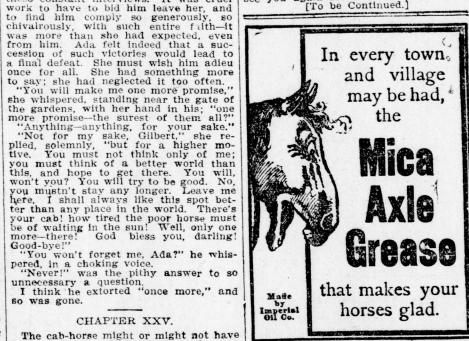

to his wish that she should sing no more in public; and, lastly, he was to depart forthwith, and they were not to meet again till his return.

I believe he was fool enough to be a little hurt at this rigorous condition. I believe he did not see in it a consummate proof of the adversary's weakness.

Ada did not dare trust herself with these constant interviews. It was cruel work to have to bid him leave her, and work to have to bid him leave her, and the forenead.

"And therefore, mother, you must think kindly of me while I am away." The herefore with think kindly of me while I am away." The herefore with the last deal more at west Acres. I shall try and be a useful member of society. In the meantime, I shall not see you again for a whole year."

stagnant pool, and a hideous red brick house beyond. I often think there must be no such thing as reality; that all depends on the glasses we look through. Alas! when they are green or blue!

As his first step in that course of moral improvement to which he now aspired. Gilbert had resolved to pay a filial visit in the square. Although he was to preserve inviolable secrecy as regarded his lady-love, he meant to break to his mother his speedy departure for the Antipodes—an announcement, he was persuaded, not without good reason, she would receive with edifying resignation. Lady Olivia had lingered in London longer than was her custom. She was going to the seaside; she hated a watering-place—the only point on which I cordially agree with her ladyship—and therefore put off the evil hour as long as possible. As her son's cab rolled up to the door, she and Lady Gertrude were busy packing—a process. I may observe, that the weaker sex seldom leave unrestrictedly to their servants. Gentlemen desire their valets to "put up their things," and trouble their heads no more about the matter; ladies inspect their own delicate preparations with the strictest scrutiny. Also, like wild partridges, after their fights, it takes them a considerable time "to settle."

His mother received Gilbert with a frown, the result of ber "wilng prepa-FOR CONSTIFF TION. MUSICAL INSTRUCTION. FOR SALLOW SKIN. ALICE CALDER STOCK - SOLOIST First Methodist Church.
