UNCLE JAKE'S ADVENTURES

A True Story of the Canadian Rebellion.

As RELATED FOR THE WORLD BY ORECIA

Forty-three years ago Burton was a thriving little hamlet containing some four hundred sonls, more or less, sifuate on the high road between London and Hamilton. It was one of those unique and interesting centres of humanity that are the necessary outgrowths of the settlement of a new country, in which every phase of human nature had an exponent, and where motley humanity lived and moved and had their being; steady-going, withal, moving along in the even tenor of their ways with an ease an regularity that bids fair to continue in their children and children's children till doomsday day, with its accompanying and annihilating forces, will put an effectual end to its somewhat varied existence.

In application I this he was aided by his treaty wife, who, through all his previous trotbles, had rendered him untold assistance. As soon as the costume was completed, Uncle Jake was forthwith transformed to his new role, and without any delay he commenced his journey, accompanied by his wife. It is needlets to detail their experience, which included not a few narrow escapes, but suffice it to say that after smuggling himself past the American sentry, a kind friend assisted him across the Niagara river to Lewiston, where he was more able to enjoy in a measure the freedom and liberty he was deprived of on his own soil. Here he remained until the excitement had almost entirely subsided and Canadian affairs had returned to their normal condition, when his wife visited Toronto and succeeded in procuring a pardon for "the simple old Dutchman," as she termed him for the purposes of her visit, after which he returned to heir normal condition, when his wife visited Toronto and succeeded in procuring a pardon for "the simple old Dutchman," as she termed him for the purposes of her visit, after which he returned to his auxious and troubled family, who welcomed him as one from the dead, where he lived to a good old age.

And thus en

where the four-in-hand mail coach stopped twice a day to allow man and beast to refresh themselves in accordance with the invitation displayed on the oval sign that | What the Alleged Fashion Critics of New York swung good-naturedly to and fro from over the watering-trough. The other usual concomitants of a rural metropolis were also to in buttons.

comitants of a rural metropolis were also to be found in the shape of the union meeting house, the somewhat dingy blacksmith shop, and the like.

Near the village lived and flourished the hero of our sketch—good old Jacob Weiss,—a true specimen of an honest-hearted, plain-spoken and laborious Pennsylvania Dutchman, who, when comparatively young, emigrated from his American fatherland and broke the soil and laid the foundation of his Canadian home.

Uncle Jake, as he was familiarly called.

of his Canadian home.

Uncle Jake, as he was familiarly called, was an active member of Burton's leading organization, which I will dub "the village club," a combination of talented and learned minds that discussed anything and everything within the range of art, science, religion or the weather—not, however, till they had distributed themselves on the available barrels and boxes that surrounded the somewhat aged and venerable stove.

These village sages soon began to hear the barrels are fashionable for home wear.

These village sages soon began to hear vague and exaggerated rumors of a rebellion somewhere in the vicinity of Toronto. Previous to this the notorious Family Compact had proved a fruitful topic for discussion. This caused, of course, a division, and the fact of the majority being taries necessitated no small amount of moral courage to express a contravy opinion, as and the fact of the majority being tories necessitated no small amount of moral courage to express a contrary opinion, as such a speaker was invariably looked upon as a fit subject for the law's operations, and such a proceeding as the acme of disloyalty. But Uncle Jake, who would have belied his character and his honesty of expression had he been induced by any such consideration to keep silence, was ever ready to utter an earnest protest against the tyrannical power that ruled the country and threatened the liberty of its inhabitants.

Affairs took definite shape when old Dr. Diamond convened several meetings, at which those present were informed of the uprising under William Lyon Mackenzie, which resulted in the formation of a small army, under Dr. D., at a spot not far distant from Burton, where no less than four hundred yeomen assembled, to fight if necessary for their country and their chil-

The little contingent were well supplied with ammunition and fire-arms, but tidings having reached their commander that Macnabb was fast advancing with a large and well-equipped force, they deemed it wise to disperse until they had gathered a more formidable number.

As might be expected, Uncle Jake was among this number, and from his special activity and his outspoken opposition, he was marked by the tory officers, who had arrived on the scene, as a most desirable arrived on the scene, as a most desirable in the property of the commander of the name goods faced with delicate gold color, with a shade of satin several hues darker than that composing the dress.

with such a force in pursuit of him Uncle Jake found it a no small job to evade them, and in the course of the ensuing few months he succeeded in escaping from their clutches by the merest accidents and well-planned schemes on the part of himself and his friends. He first fled to an adjoining county, and was wearily approaching the house of an old friend, Mr. Hall, what he encountered his first experience by catching sight of his pursuers in the distance. Retreating hastily to a hill in close proximity to the house, he had the mourful satisfaction of seeing a brother rebel carried off. After their departure, he started to visit a shingle-mill near by, where some arms had been secreted a few weeks before, when he was suddenly overtaken by a body of armed horsemen, noire of whom, fortunately, knew him. Angrily demanding of him information regarding some secreted areas they had been told were in the vicinity, he lay on the roadside, a wooful place, was left alone, it need not be added, to his great joy. He lost not thus released the poor fugitive with oper arms and warms hearted hospitality. But his tribulations were far from being ended. As soon a his relentless pursuers discovered their mistake, and suddenly put in an appearance at Mrs. Hall's, to the utter consternation of the good old lady. Uncle Jake had barely crawled under the bed that stood opposite the capacious fireplace when the tories entered, and safely crawled under the bed that stood opposite the capacious fireplace when the tories entered, and a few for handled the provided the proposite the capacious fireplace when the tories entered, and a few for handled the provided the proposite the capacious fireplace when the tories entered, and a few for handled the provided the proposite the capacious fireplace when the tories entered, and a few for handled the provided the pro

Angered beyond measure at their ill-success, with a strange fatality they entered the barn and started to pitch the oats to their horses from the pile that concealed the old gentleman, but fortune again smiled on him as they ceased just in time to leave him but a remarkably thin covering of straw.

Uncle Jake made Hall's his home for over two months, during which time he secreted himself in a small cellar dug to order for him, when he decided to make a bold strike for liberty and thus put an end to the miserable uncertainty and danger of his present condition. It was indeed a bold scheme—no less than to disguise himself in female garb, and thus escape to the

In architectual lines, Burton contained the inevitable corner grocery, with its multifarious contents, from the box full of yellowstreaked taffy that mesmerized the small boy to the lately imported hogshead of sugar. Adjoining this necessary and popular institution stood "The Farmers' Home," where the four-in-hand mail coach stopped
