READING STORIES.

Jean and Marion are always just as happy as can be when they are seated on their papa's knees listening to the stories which he either tells or reads to them. They are particularly fond of stories about animals. One day their father read them one about a wild turkey which said that the turkey is a native of North America, and is sometimes caught in traps. After hearing this story, the little girls thought over it a good deal, and one day the thought came to them that, as they lived in North America, there must be turkeys about, so what did they do but make a trap, but, alas! no poor turkey was ever caught in it.
