Sometimes the cow-dung is mixed with bullock's blood which allows their taking on a certain amount of polish. There are, of course, exceptions to this humble rule of house building; places in which good brick walls, clean wooden floors and nice shady stoops (verandahs) may be found. The farm buildings are primitive in the extreme, and seldom consist of more than a one-sided shed where cows and calves are kept, and in which the sheep-shearing is done when the season for that work arrives. In addition there may be a barn and perhaps an implement shed of wood and corrugated iron.
