apt to think of nothing but the commerwho has had the actual scenes of war-fare presented to his mental vision there can be few things more pathetic that the slaughter of horses. A man joins the army with his eyes open. He knows full well that he is embracing a murder-ous profession. He knows that it is his business to kill, and, of course, he takes the chances of being killed himself. When two men go out to fight a duel they are on even terms. Each is bent on killing the other, and so neither has any ground of complaint if he is badly maimed, or rendered defective for life. But a horse is not a fighting animal. It does not It knows nothing of fer for no wrong that it has ever done anyone. The following is the picture of the awful suffering of horses as presented by correspondents in South Africa:

"But of all the pitiful, heart-rending sights I have ever seen none has compared to this view of hundreds upon hundreds of dead and dying horses on this 100 miles of war's promenade. The poor beasts had done no man harm—in fact each one had been a man's reliance-and to see them shattered by shell and then ripped open by valtures, often before the process, often before the process, often before the process, of the the proc our supplies and reinforcements.
