SMALL ORCHARDS ARE DISAPPEARING

(Toronto Globe.)

A few weeks ago a prediction was made in the Country Life Department of the Globe that apple growing in the near future would largely be confined to commercial growers, that is, to men who make a specialty of producing apples only. The following extracts from a United States bulletin on commercial apple industry in the United States would seem to verify this prediction:

For a long period of years the census has been showing the total number of bearing and non-bearing trees and also total production, but no distinction was made between the trees in home orchards and those in commercial orchards. When the census figures would show a decline in the total production many people took this as a strong recommendation for planting. As a matter of fact, when the census was showing a decline in total production there were at times actual increases in commercial production. In other words, while the production from the old farm orchards throughout the middle west and the eastern states was rapidly decreasing, there were springing up in the far west and elsewhere highly intensive regions which were increasing the commercial production very materially.

Commercial Production Increased.

In 1917 the western boxed apple crop produced in Colorado and states west amounted to nearly 40 per cent of the total commercial production of the United States. For the past three years western production has approximated one-third of the total commercial crop, yet twenty years ago western production was practically negligible. When we consider the enormous commercial increase in the west, a pronounced increase in the commercial production in the Shenandoah-Cumberland region of Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania, the improved facilities and attention given generally to the distribution, storage and handling of commercial apples, it must be apparent that our commercial apple production has been steadily increasing, particularly during the past ten years. However, if we turn to records of the total production, which make no distinction between commercial and non-commercial apples, we find that in total production the crop of 1896 was one of the largest ever harvested, 77,538,000 barrels, as compared with the record production of 1914, 84,400,000 barrels.

The point is that during the last twenty years commercial apple growing has made vast strides, while the home orchards have been declining.
