so far off, the effect is being felt locally, the war having had the effect of delaying the sailing of R. M. S. Empress of Japan for the longest time on record, and she will not get away until Friday. She was to have sailed this evening, but is compelled to wait for the English mail, for owing to the number of trans-Atlantic steamers taken from that route for transport duty, the mail has been delayed. Some sixty or seventy steamers have been chartered by the British government for transport service, and of these the majority were taken from the Atlantic route. The European mail will not arrive for four days owing to the delay in crossing the Atlantic. The old story bobs up wherever there is talk of war, that the Empress is being held pending a decision as to whether she will be needed for transport service, has been again brought up, but there is nothing in the old threadbare rumor. All that is detains here is the non-arrival of the mail. In common with the other Paci-fic liners the Empress is crowded to her the highest paid constable.
