BROADCLOTH OR HOMESPUN?

By Joseph E. Badger, Jr.

I knew all three of the persons more im-mediately concerned, though the curious affair transpired while I was a lad not yet Maywood was more surprised by this un-ia my teens. First was Nelly Arkwright, the daughter first appearance of the supposed bear, but and only child of the village "'squire," a at he heard low chuckles coming from the pretty maiden of about seventeen, small, plump, flaxen-haired, with great blue eyes that habitually wore an expression of wondering timidity, but which could snap and sparkle with glee or mischief, when the oc--one of a thousand. But that part of her now history does not concern us now.

The second was Jim Martin, a second oughly aroused. young fellow, who divided his time between oughly aroused. "Mr. Martin," he said, his voice ringing in the said of the second oughly aroused. perhaps, but a heart of gold, a handsome athlete, and a general favorite among the country belles. He had eyes only for Nelly, however, and it was generally believed that they were engaged, until Eugene Maywood made his appearance in our village to spend the Summer for the benefit of his health. A slender, handsome young gentleman, but who was at once set down as a shallow, brainless fop by the male portion of the community. Not so with the fair sex. The first "meeting" settled that, and for the rest of the day the handsome stranger was liscussed far more eagerly and thoroughly than was the minister's sermon. And before two weeks had passed by, it was clear to all, even to himself, that Maywood need only say the word, and not a marriageable female in that vicinity but would gladly give an affirmative answer. Not even those who disliked him most could deny his having good taste, for at the end of the two weeks he changed his boarding-place to the 'squire's, and began keeping steady company with Nelly Arkwright. Everybody knows what this means, in remonstrances were laid before the 'squire on his foolish course in letting a perfect stranger into the bosom of his family. But the jolly old farmer only chuckled, and said hat he recko care of herself. It was a bitter blow to Jim Martin, for he loved pretty Nelly with all the fervor of his big, honest heart, and had thought matters were thoroughly understood between them. True, no positive pledge had been asked or given, but they had been "keeping company" for nearly a year, and that was a sort of tacit engagement Now, however, he resolved to know his fate, and one evening he stubbornly waited until Maywood quietly retired for the night, in the ascendant, and he was resolved that though he could not have mistaken the purpose of his stalwart rival, then in plain words asked Nelly to be his wife. Gently she declined, feeling no little compunction at his evident suffering, for she knew that she had given him positive encouragement. Martin had the good sense not to make a scene, and quietly retired. Had it not been for officious outsiders, he would have borne his defeat without an outward sign, but never a village was without its busy-bodies, and by false report they roused the anger of the rejected lover. Several times Martin sought to pick a fighting." And before half an hour passed uarrel with Maywood, but he was a gentle- it was clear to see that the only hope renan at least, and when his efforts were quietly ignored, he could not act the ruffian. where his superior strength would more Yet he and the rest of the villagers, with than offset the greater science of the other. very few exceptions, believe Maywood an very few exceptions, believe Maywood an arrant coward.

So matters stood on the Fourth of July, an occasion of great interest to the rural denizens, who still adhere to the time honored customs of their forefathers.
There were the usual sports and speeches, the great barbecue, the swings and the usual amount of flirting and genuine lovemaking.
Nelly and Eugene took little part in these amusements: too stnck up the envious ones said—but little did they care for the comments which occasionally met their ears.
He saw this as well as we did, and strove to close, but in vain. Every rush was eluded, and those small fists, now covered with blood, continued their remoisless tattooupon his face, throat and breast.
It was a full hour before the fistic duel ended, in the downfall of Martin, at length knocked senseless.
Buised and bleeding though he was, Maywood was foremost in restoring his fallen antagonist, and when his senses returned Martin grasped his hand feebly.
O In that grasp all enmity was buried, and truer friends never lived than those two, from that day on until death broke the bond. ments which occasionally met their ears. ments which occasionally net shelt cats. Slowly they strolled away, deeper into the wood, enjoying love's young dream, all the world to each other. Jim Martin was thoroughly ashamed of himself, but the knowledge that he would now be the laughing-stock that he had hoped to make his rival, together with the cutting words of Maywood, roused his worst passions. Nor were these cooled by the actions of Nelly Arkwright.

She hastily descended from her perch, and tremblingly begged Maywood to press the matter no further. It was clear that her solicitude was altogether on his account, and with grating teeth Jim Martin inwardly resolved to pummel the dandified

Eager to witness the fun, though this was the country or in a rural village, and many taking a shape so different from that which they had expected, the hidden settlers came out of their ambush.

Maywood sought to pacify Nelly, but with poor success. Though not naturally guarrelsome, Martin bad had many "turnups," and was considered invincible in that neighborhood. Finally he placed her in charge of one of the older men present, then removed his outer garments, preparing for the heavy job he had cut out for himself, with the air of one who did not underrate his antagonist, but who was still confident that he could make good his words. Even more eagerly did Martin ship and toe the scratch. His worse passions were at least one of them should not leave that glade on his own feet. The contest was long and stubbornly contested. Boy as I was, I still remember every detail of that fight, and could reproduce them here if such a course was suitable. But the Banner Weekly is no "sporting" paper, and a literal report would justly disgust the majority of its patrons. If your little boy or girl comes home with a sore throat, the first thing to do is to rub the throat and chest with Polis to rub the throat and chest with For-son's Nerviline. Don't be afraid to use Nerviline ireely—a whole bottle full wouldn't burn or blister the tenderest skin. Rub it until all taken up by the pores, and just before the child goes to sleep give him a glass of hot water into which 30 drops of Nerviline has previous ly been stirred. This is a sure, pleasant and speedy cure. Large bottles 25 cents.

JUST A COLD IN THE HEAD!

With a fierce snarl, a huge black bear umbered out of the bushes and threatenngly advanced !

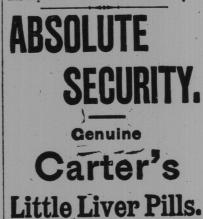

Nelly shrieked with terror, and clung trembling, almost fainting, to the side of her lover. And he? At first his face was turned as white as death and he started back, as though he was about to flee, at the same time shaking the hand of the terrified maiden from his arm. Had there been any mortal eyes upon them, those who owned the orbs would have believed him a craven, who was seeking to disencumber kimself of a helpless burden, that he might the more surely save his own life by precipitate flight -that he meant to abandon the fair girl to the fury of the nonstrous beast. But nothing was further from his thoughts than such dastardliness. Instead, he raised Nelly in his arms, and, with a power that seemed marvelous in one of his slender build, he swung her up into the fork of a tree behind him, then drew a small revolver and confronted the beast.

The weapon was more of an orname than aught else. Its tiny pellets, no matter how well directed, could scarcely penetrate the thick hide of a bear. He must have known this, but there was not a drop of coward blood in his veins, and he faced
