People don't leave home because they find it difficult to make a living by working for it, but because they fancy a living may be made elsewhere without work. The bitter disappointments that follow the trial are generally carefully hidden within the breasts of the sufferers. A case has just come to light in Boston that is, except for the tragic ending, the counterpart of many thousand. A young man left his farm for "genteel" employment at an "intelligence office" in Boston. He was at once engaged as a bill collector, at a good salary, deposited all the money he had, the fruits of his savings of years, as a scourity for the faithful performance of his duties, found that he had been made a victim—that the engagement was a bogus one, and was langhed at when he presented the note he had received from the agent with whom he had deposited his money, went back to this home, brooded over his loss and his shame for a time, and then blew out his bame for a time, and then blew out his shame for a time, and then blew out his shame for a time, and then blew out his shame for a time, and then blew out his bame broaded the discovery of the cause of the billed that the had been made a victim—that the engagement was a bogus one, and was langhed at when he presented the note he had received from the agent with whom he had deposited his money, went back to this home, brooded over his loss and his shame for a time, and then blew out his shame for a time, and then blew out his bame for a time, and then blew out his shame for a time, and then blew out his bame for a time, and then blew out his bame to our shores, I have of the old showers of the cause of the had been made as placed to the blook of the blook ple don't leave home because they find Govern

Should this craving for the "genteel" continue to increase there will soon be only one adequately paid class—the common laborers—all trades and professions being so overstocked that their members will look with hungry envy on the well-paid laborers who make laws and regulations for the government of their employers and all concerned.

Government to interfere with the matter at all.

Mr. Palmer delivered a brief but able legal argument, based on the B. N. A. Act, to show that Dominion Government had control of all legislation not specially left with local legislatures. Dominion Government could legislate on regulation of all kinds of weights and measures, and all articles of trade and commerce.

Mr. Mills was forced to admit the truth of these arguments.

Mr. Anglin did the same, but thought Mr. Angin did the same, but thought there was no means of actually affecting the quality of gas.

Mr. Palmer said if it were admitted that this Parliament had power to legislate on this subject, it had also power to inflict penalties for violations of the laws passed.
