At One o'clock, the Council adjourned to wait upon His Excellency with their Address.

The Council having again met—

The President reported, that His Excellency had been pleased to return the following answer to their Address.

Mr. President, and Gentlemen of His Majesty's Council,

Though imperfection attend all human efforts, yet where a mutual disposition to friendly consideration is dominant, the chances of erring are lessened—It is with unmingled satisfaction, therefore, that I hail in your Address a feeling so conducive to the honor of His Majesty's service, and your own inseparable interests.

Could I seek a higher incentive to the performance of my duty, than a sense of the sacredness of the delegated trust that it involves, it would be afforded by the kindness of your present expressions.

Adjourned until One o'clock to-morrow.
