Russia does not desire a war with Great Britain now any more than she did in 1854, but her reckless statesmen are playing with fire, and a conflagration may result without their intending it. To Russia a war at present would be extremely disastrous, and it would interfere with her plans for industrial development and throw her finsness into disorder. It would also probably, in the end break up Russia's alliance with France, which was certainly not made by the latter with a view of assisting Russia to absorb the Chinese empire, or divide it with Germany. The latter power also, while urging Russia on with words of sympathy, would not fail
