Love Finds the Way

"Poor Kate!" he muttered; "poor Kate! twill go hard with her; but she will suffer and be strong, or if not—well, she must suffer."
He rose and rang the bell.
"Lights, good woman, and some wine."
They brought him the lights and the bottle of wine.
He had ordered it for the good of the house, and but sips a little of it without enjoyment.
Wine had lost its generous savor for him with most of this world's gifts, and he took them mechanically.
Before he had sunk back into the old attitude, the door opened and Kate Tuese gifted in A look of nain flushed.
"You will be in no danger?" she said, anxiously.

She shook her head.

"The fire is inside," she said, gravely, and with another sigh; "you have the feverish fit on you to-night."

"I have," he said, with a short laugh,

"I want you to go to London," he said.
"To London?" she repeated.

He nodded. "Yes, and if need be, to Calais."

"Why?" she said.
"To wait for me," he said.
Her face as rapidly brightened, and a could hear that her breath came fast.
"To wait for you," she said. "Are you strictly leading?"

"To wait for you," she said. "Are you not jesting?"

"No, sweet Kate," he replied. "I am in sober earnest. Give me your hand, that I may see if I can make it burn as you say mine does. Listen: I have been thinking, sweet girl, and I am convinced that I have had enough of all this work. My revenge is complete; look around and see if it's not so. I am tired and weary of it; I would be at rest—at rest and peace, in some milder climate, in my dear Italy; there in a hill-nesteled valley, perfumed with the vine and golden with the Italian sun, I would be at peace, with my Kate—"

A cry of delight that would break forth, stopped him. She trembled from head to foot, and the hand, as he had prophesied, burned in his.

"Are you deceiving me, Melchior?" she breathed, firing her gray eyes all alight, upon his face, that seemed wrap-milder this state."

"Are you deceiving me, Melchior?" she breathed, firing her gray eyes all alight, upon his face, that seemed wrapped in a peaceful smile. "Are you painting a fancy picture to make me weep, or, is it really to be? Oh, Melchoir, for a week of such happiness, I feel that I could barter eternity!"

"No such hard bargain shall be required of you, Kate," he said, taking "Mr. and "and Mr. and "Are you painting a fancy picture of such appiness, I feel that I could barter eternity!"

"No such hard bargain shall be required of you, Kate," he said, taking her other hand and lifting both to his lips, one after another. "You know me, a moment sufficies for the birth of a resolve, but this resolution has been brought forth slowly and with much thought. I am weary, I say, and would be at rest. I have punished the cursed race that did the wrong. I have amassed wealth enough to make me a prince in that same valley, I have gained a faithful and loving heart."—here he drew her nearer to him, and her head fell upon his breast—"and I would be at peace."

"It is the first time I have ever asked." said Miss Lucas.

The woman who had been true to he master—though false to all else—wept on his shoulder. The icy Kate Lucas was melted, and, like Niobe, all tears. He chided her tenderly—his eyes dancing with fiendish mockery over her shoulder the while—and at last, when her sobs of delight and joy had ceased, he told her his wishes.

"You will start to-night, Kate, and go on to Calais. Wait there till I can join you. I may be a week, I may be a fortnight. If I am so long as the latter, I would have you go on to Lausanjon. I have a house there all ready to receive a prince. You shall travel as Mrs. Clifford; you shall arrive there as its mistress and—my wife."

She caught his hand feverishly.

"Your wife!" she said.

"Ay" he said, drooping his eyelids, "my wife, I will write on to the housekeeper to have all ready for you, but wait for me for the fortnight at Calais. And now to-night you start. You are mistress at the Hall and cam make any excuse for your sudden journey; and, Kate"—he lowered his voice to a dulcet whisper—"do not go empty-handed. Remember the Israelities, and when you leave your Egypt, forget not the ornaments. Spoil my lady's jewel casket, Kate, and spane it not. You have the key, I'll be sworn."

She smiled and flushed.

"I thought so," he said, stroking his mustache. "Riffe it well, the Melville diamonds will shine right royally on Madam Clifford's brow, the emeralds will sparkle, and the rubies glitter right merrily on her bosom. Oh, empty the jewel case, by all means, sweet Kate."

He was careasing her hand the while he spoke, and the woman, in a delirious, dreamlike state, listened eagerly.

"Come," he said, "you have to pack."

Before he had sunk back into the old attitude, the door opened and Kate Lucas glided in. A look of pain flushed across her face as she came to his side, and in a low voice she said:

"I am late; you are not angry?"
"No, Kate," he said, looking up at her with a smile, and holding out the white hand.
"No, it is not in me to be angry to-night."
She took the hand and caressed it with doglike affection and sighed.
"It is red-hot," she said.
"Ay." he said, nodding at the fire, "You would say it was too warm for a fire, Kate, and I have been roasting here."

"Book Kate!" he muttered. "She is

She shook her head.

"The fire is inside," she said, gravely, and with another sigh; "you have the feverish fit on you to-night."

"I have," he said, with a short laugh, "dreadfully. My heart beats like an engine and my head is full of fire, and yet. Kate. I have not been drinking, as you see," and he lifted the bottle to the light.

She stood before the fire, looking into it uneasily.

"You laugh at me if I say 'see a doctor."

"Ay," he said, laughing, "or, better still, I walk to the looking glass and do asyou wish. I 'see a doctor' then, you know."

"Hush," she said, loking round. "Do you think detection is impossible? Are there no sharp eyes-here that will recognize in you the well known Dr. Bromwell?"

"No" he said. "Look at me. I smooth lies."

"You' he said. "Look at me. I smooth lies."

"Celegate the muttered. "She is the only woman who ever really loved me. What should I have done without ler grand tact and courage? Poor Kate!"

Then with a harsh laugh, he seized the bottle, but before he had poured the wine out he had gone off on another train of thought, and he sat drooping before the fire without lifting the glass, or moving hand or foot, until the rattle of carriage wheels went past the house, then he started up, caught up a candle, and muttering: "Poor Kate!"

Kate!" ascended the stairs to his bed-inable.

In half an hour he came down into the liftle bar, with a face looking ten years younger, without wrirkles or hollows, with a bright bloom upon the full cheek, and a light-hearted smile upon his lips.

He caled for another bottle of wine.

ognize in you the well known Dr. Brom-well?"

"No," he said. "Look at me, I smooth my face and all the wrinkles go, I amie and I am young again. Besides, where is the slight limp, the long dark hair, the dector's stoop? All gone, not a trace of them left, and I am quite another person."

The slight effort required to affect the changes on his countenance seemed to rouse him, and with a lighter step he rose and stood by her side, poked the fire, and, looking into her face, said:

"Well, you are patient as of old, Kate. You?"

As solitary as the man, Melchior, in the alehouse parlor sat Leonora, Lady Melville, in the luxurious drawing-room. Dinner had been served in the small dining-room, and her ladyship had toyed with the wing of a chicken and had been seen to eat a few grapes.

She was back now in the drawing-room, with its wax candles and silver candlesticks, its costly hangings and buh! furniture. But for all the beauties and luxuries of the apartment, my lady had no eyes, her dark, sombre, brooding ones were fixed, like the man in the alehouse, upon the fire.

the liquid look clear and boils over the soap it is ready to skim.

Line a wooden box with a piece of wet ruslin, skim out soap and put in the box to drain about twelve hours and cut in bars. This will make twelve large bars of hard white soap. It may be used for any kind of washing.

Take a little of the soap and press in the hand. If it sticks to the hand and looks greasy it needs a little more lye; if too flakey more fat. The liquid can be used for scrubbing.

DOING UP LINEN COLLARS.

To do up white linen collars with a laundry finish: For one-half dozen collars blend well in cold water two large tablesponfuls of lump starch, over this pour nearly a quart of boiling water, stirring constantly; place over the fire and boil for five minutes.

When this starch is cool enough to put the hands in take each collar, which has been well washed and dried, and rub the starch in well on both sides; go put the hands in take each collar, which has been well washed and dried, and rub the starch in well on both sides; go over the surface of each thoroughly and rub the collars between your hands several times, putting on plenty of the warm starch. The secret lies in getting the starch well into the dry collars.

Roll up-and leave over night. With an old soft piece of cloth rub the surplus starch off each collar before you iron it.

Now iron the collar until it is per-fectly dry, turn it over by hand, and button the ends together to have it shaped nicely

WHEN IRONING.

I take a lid off my cooking range, place over gas, put on three irons. When they are heating I get meat for a stew, put in kettle with handle and place over the irons. This keeps irons hot and boils meat at the same time. I place water kettle next to irons, and that is heated by the time I want it for the dishes.

When ironing, put pillow cases over loard and iron handkerchiefs on them. You are thus ironing both at the same

You are thus ironing both at the same time. The dampness of the handker chiefs dampens the pillow cases just enough to make them nice and smooth I use four irons.

ECONOMY IN DRESS.

It is no unusual experience to find half a dozen wash dresses belonging to members of the family too faded after several washings to be wearable, while in other espects they are perfectly good. They can easily be turned into fresh white costumes to be worn at home all fall and winter.

First, have the dresses washed and all spots taken out—fruit stains with boil-spots taken out—fruit stains with boil-ing water (if the stain has been fixed by ing water (if the stain has been fixed by time, soak the article in a weak solution of oxalic acid), iron rust with salt and lemon juice. After rinsing thoroughly put them to soak in lukewarm water in which chloride of lime has been dissolved. Use about two tablespoonfuls to a gallon of water. Soak an hour or two, then rinse in clear water, and it will be found that the last vestiges of the once dainty stripes and figures have entirely disappeared.

The dresses can then be worn white or can be colored some light shade. Sometimes colored dress linens that have become faded by exposure in store windows can be bought cheap, and these may be whitened in the same way.

Turkish Troops Annihilated.

Rome, Aug. 24.—It is semi-officially announced that the Mahdist movement at Yemen, in Southwestern Arabia, has become acutely revolutionary, and several detachments of Ottoman troops have been annihilated. The local Governor has appealed to Constantinople to send more troops.
