long days, when there was no one to look for, and to welcome! Not till he was gone did she realize all he had been it was some on, and that spring-day when she had fold Jack Walsingham she would not be his wife seemed so far away, removed by such whole years of regret and cite, that it was almost as if it had happened in another existence. Equally true it was that this quiet, sad Rosamond was another creature from the petted, brillant, light hearted Rosse that the spring sun had shone on. Neither the General or his sister ever mentioned Jack's name; and, from shrinking at the thought that they might do so, Rosamond came to pine for the sound of it with a wild, feverish longing that shocked herself.—Harriet Beauchamp, too, had gone to visit her friends in the north, and, though she worte duly to her friend, was much too indignant on her cousin's behalf to speak of him or of his doings.

But there came a certain Sunday when Rosamond once more saw her old playfellow. It was, I am sorry to say, at church, when, at Rosamond of such an impertinence.

mond once more saw her old playfellow. It was, that chill autumn evening, had any one been guilty I am sorry to say, at church, when, as Rosamond of such an impertinence. I am sorry to say, at church, when, as Rosamond of such an impertunence, chanced to turn her head, she saw, with a great bound of the heart, Jack Walsingham in the very straw hat, with its bunch of scarlet poppies, and act of entering the church with the Dacres. I fear, though Rosamond immediately bent her eyes the sheltered path that led to the Drooping Well, on her book, that henceforth the sacred duty she was there to perform was interrupted by many distanced and rebellious wanderings. Though she one which would have been more in keeping with never looked in that direction, somehow she seemed summer sunshine, than this mournful autumn day, the days how did she be. never looked in that direction, somehow she seemed to see without looking. Ah, dear, how did she become conscious of the attentive assiduity of Mr. Walsingham in fluding Miss Dacres's places in her prayer-book? She was confident she never looked at him; then by what magic was it she was cognisted in the time Jack had mentioned, yet could not at him; then by what magic was it she was cognisted in the time Jack had mentioned, yet could not the looked at him; then by what magic was it she was cognisted in the time Jack had mentioned, yet could not the looked the service was over, Rosie, with an impulse she could not resist, utured one fleeting glance on her rejected laver, and, as if some magnetic influence forced lover, and, as if some magnetic influence forced looked at each other. Jack colored a little, but he looked quite kindly and steadfastly on his first love; while Rosie turned hurriedly away, ashamed and wild and despairing pain.—Showers of dying leaves
