OLD WORLD NEWS BY THE WIRELESS

Associated Press May Adopt It for the Collection of Its News.

New York, Feb. 7. - Tests made by the Associated Press may determine whether a trans-Atlantic wireless telegraph system is a possibility for the transmission and reception of news. The trials have been in progress for more than a week between stations on the coasts of Scotland and Massachusetts, and, while the results so far have not borne out the success promised for the system by its projectors, sufficient encouragement has been derived to have high hopes built upon the outcome of the experiment. Before the system was placed in the hands of the Associated Press for its condemnation or its approval it had undergone exhaustive tests by its promoters. So well satisfied were they with the results achieved that the entire plant was turned over to the operators of the news association, who

It was agreed that the company owning the system should be allowed an extra period for supplementary tests. For fifteen days these trials continued, the station being established on the Scottish coast and in Massachusetts, near Plymouth. In ten of these days unusually good results were attained, the other five days were not so successful, on account of atmomechanical difficulties.
