wending their way across the mountain.

At the hour appointed to leave all gathered at the place where they were to meet the team. It was soon discovered that four of the party were missing; but in a short time they returned and the party set out in high spirits for home. But in the midst of their merriment, they missed two other young ladies. This cast a shadow over the rest of the drive, and on the arrival in town Mr. Harlow secured a fresh horse and started back to search for the unfortunate young ladies.

In the meantime these two concluding they had been left, began the journey on foot. On arriving at the old mill, they took a short route, thereby missing their teacher, who was diligently enquiring and searching for them. For some time he could hear no news of them, but at last he was told that they had passed some time before, and he at once turned to overtake them.

The first sight he caught of them was near the Salmon River bridge, where they awaited his approach and were driven to their respective homes.

There were great rejoicings when the news spread that the wanderers had been found.
