Notice the resemblance between the bridge in the picture and the Massey-Harris Gear Frame below—it is the strongest form known.

To secure a solid and substantial foundation or frame work has been the constant effort of binder manufacturers, and because of their ill-success in this line many machines have been entire failures. A self-binder has to be strong and stiff enough to admit of being hauled about over rough land, amongst stumps and stones—a test of the greatest severity—without jolting or twisting out of shape. Wooden frames, like wooden bridges, have been abandoned as insecure and impracticable. Some makers use round or square piping for their frames; but did you ever see a railway bridge built of iron gas pipe? How would you like to ride over one? The strongest construction known is Solid Steel Angles well trussed. A binder frame of angle steel, properly constructed (our methods are patented) will ensure a SOLID FOUNDATION and the moving parts built up on such a framework will remain in perfect alignment and correct relationship, thus ensuring long life and an easy, light running machine.
