JUNE.—There is no doubt that the cabbage grower loses more plants from the cabbage maggot than from any other pest. The female lays her eggs close to the stem of the plant after it has been set out, the eggs hatch in a few days, and the work of destruction begins; suddenly the plant collapses, and nothing will revive it. The best treatment for these maggots is to use white hellebore, 2oz. to three gallons of water. Force the liquid around the root of the plant, which should first be laid bare, then restore the earth. The hellebore kills the maggot and the forcible application tends to drive it away from the root. This should be done about the third week in June, and, if carefully attended to, very few of the plants will be lost.
