"SHIP AHOY!"

A Story in thirty-six Cable Lengths.
THIRTY-SECOND CABLE LENGTH.

HOW JOHN ANDERSON SWAM FOR TWO LIVES.

John Anderson knew that a sailor must never despair, even though death stood by beckoning him, and saying that his time had come. His life was one long struggle with the grim shade; and had he been of a cowardly, weak nature, he might again and again, have given away to despair. But certainly, now, matters seemed at their blackest. Basalt was drowning; the ship was rudderless, and lay helpless and rolling with the waves breaking over her.

What could he do?
The answer came at once; he must risk all, and lower down the boat if he could, trusting to Providence for the chance of regaining the ship.

Fortunately they had patched up the hole stove in her, and she now hung at the davits ready for use.

Jumping into her, and holding the flap in his hands, he lowered away till she kissed the wave that rose to meet her. Another instant, and as she lifted he had cast off one fall, and almost by a miracle the old man was afloat.

To seize an oar was the work of another moment; and, pushing off, he had it directly over the stern, and was sculling away in the direction in which he hoped Basalt to be.

He knew that the old man was a good swimmer, and there was a chance that he might have reached the lifebuoy. It was a threadlike chance to cling to, though; and as he rose upon the wave and looked around, his heart sank lower minute by minute; for he was receding fast from the ship, the sea was getting higher, and not a glimpse of the swimmer could be seen.

He altered his course, sculling with all his might—his standing position giving him a chance of seeing in all directions, as the frail boat rose to the crest of the waves.

Again he changed his course, scull-ing almost at random; for the minutes sped on, and not a sign of the drowning man could be seen. Then, suddenly, Anderson uttered a cry of joy, loosed his hold of the oar, sculling forward, and, as the boat slid down the side of a hill of green water, he leaped over and caught the life-buoy.

He sank back mute and despairing; for he had drawn the light cork ring into the boat, and it had no despairing, dying clutch upon it.

But what was that? faint almost as a whisper.

A word, a gurgle; appealing cry, borne on the wind, to reach his ears—
'My God!'

The dying, appealing cry of a drowning wretch to his Maker; and, as it passed away, Anderson was again at the stern of the boat, sculling away with all his might; in the direction from which the sound had seemed to come.

Water—water! great, green waves, white, silvery, foaming crests; but no Basalt, no agonized face, no outstretched hands. Good heavens! had he been so near to him, and yet not been able to save?

In his agony John Anderson so-phered his boat that the stout ash blade beant again, while with starting eyes he gazed here, there; and then, uttering a cry of joy, gave a leap that sent the boat rocking back, through the water as he parted the waves, disappeared for a few moments, then reappeared, swimming boldly and bravely to ward that which had caught his eye for an instant amidst the foam of a breaking wave—one crook-fingered hand making its last despairing catch at life.

It was a bold dash, and one that needed nerve and strength; for as he swam on, with the salt spray at his lips, it was with the waves seeking to buffet him
