Quite often the poor food is most needed to prevent undue clogging of the digestive apparatus. a small quantity of wheat middlings in milk, or, if milk cannot be got, in water, was always greedily eaten. So, too, fattening hogs will eat freely of roots, especially of beets or mangels, though these have very small amount of nutrition. If neither the middlings nor roots can be had, give the hogs some chopped clover and see them eat it. They will not eat very much, but the little that they take is necessary as a divisor to prevent their richer food from cloying them. Fattening sheep will always cat a little grain straw if they have a grain ration that contains too much nitrogenous matter. Yestraw of itself is so poor a feed that if given with nothing else sheep will starve on it, and those that are vigorous will die from lack of nutrition
