Fooling the Submarines

Occasionally we learn of humorou ncidents of the war that tend to lighten the general gloom that surrounds the operations of land and sea. One of these is a device adopted by the British admiralty to fool the German submarines. In the many ports and shipyards of the British Isles are scores of merchantmen of various types that for various reasons have been withdrawn from active service. But although intended for an ignominous finish on the scrap heap, the war When the war is has found for them a useful if odd o'er, with its part.
