Jared Vining, also of the utilities commission, expressed his deep regret at the defeat of certain bylaws. The bylaws, in his opinion, were much more important to the city than the selection of men for public offices. He did not believe that many of the bylaws should have been put to a vote. The city council should have dealt with them instead of "passing the buck to the people," was the way Mr. Vining expressed his opinion. Washington, D. C., Jan. 4.—There were growing indications tonight that the Senate's struggle to dispose of the peace treaty would be renewed during the coming week with an increased determination on the part of those who want ratification.

Senators returning from holiday trips to their homes added several new suggestions to the compromise proposals of those who had remained here during the recess to work on a conciliation program, As a result the compromise negotiations seemed likely to take a wide scope, and although no one could predict certainty of the result, the reopening of the whole subject in private and party conferences and on the Senate floor apparently was assured.
