THE LOVE OF PRAISE.

THOSE who condemn the love of praise and lament the fear of shame misconceive the true nature of these sentiments, and judge of them in their degenerate state. The love of praise in its reasonable, healthy action is not a craving for flattery. However eagerly an honorable love of praise may grasp its meed, it rejects whatever is not honestly its due. But it is only in its healthy action that this sentiment is productive of good, and therefore it is of greatest importance that its healthy action should be preserved; and this is not to be secured by neglect any more than by excessive laudation. The love of praise undoubtedly lies at the root of all well-doing, and prompts, at least originally, the love of duty. By judiciously fostering this attribute of generous minds the necessity for punishment, the in-fiction of which is a pain to the sensitive, may be escaped. Yet as the love of praise is peculiarly liable to degenerate into a craving for flattery that quickly becomes insatiable, it is of the utmost importance to keep that great principle in view, that "praise is worth nothing if it be not founded on truth." The fear of shame, in its very nature, is adapted to be a restraint upon the inordinate desire for approbation, just as the love of praise is intended to counteract the excessive and depressing dread of censure. The temperaments most susceptible to praise are invariably most keenly alive to blame, and it is the fault of parents and teachers if that susceptibility hardens into indifference, or degenerates into an unworthy appetite for adulation independent of desert. The child that does not care for praise is always most difficult to control, for the sense of shame is dull where desire for approval does not exist; and
